

Orthology Photography Fiction Fishing
Christianity Art Cooking Essays
Buddhism Freemasonry Medicine Biology
Music Ancient Egypt Evolution
Carpentry Physics Dance Geology
Mathematics Fitness Shakespeare
Science Yoga Marketing Confidence Immortality Biographies Poetry Psychology Witchcraft Electronics
Chemistry History Law Accounting
Philosophy Anthropology Alchemy Drama
Quantum Mechanics Atheism Sexuality
Mental Health Ancient History Criminal Engineering Leadership Languages Sport
Paleontology New York City Technology
Metaphysics Investment Archaeology

Forgotten Books

— www.forgottenbooks.com —

Copyright © 2016 FB &c Ltd.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, distributed, or transmitted in any form or by any means, including photocopying, recording, or other electronic or mechanical methods, without the prior written permission of the publisher, except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical reviews and certain other noncommercial uses permitted by copyright law.

THE MARCH OF THE TEN THOUSAND

BEING A TRANSLATION OF THE ANABASIS

PRECEDED BY A LIFE OF XENOPHON

BY
H. G. DAKYNS, M.A.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
PUBLISHED BY THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
CHICAGO, ILL., U.S.A.

London
MACMILLAN AND CO., LIMITED
NEW YORK: THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

1901

888.3
P12 d
Cop. 2

235454

Reprinted with corrections from Volume I. of "The Works of Xenophon," Translated by H. G. Dakyns, M.A. 4 vols. Crown 8vo (Macmillan and Co., 1890).

Y9A981.1 0807M

PREFATORY NOTE

I OUGHT to explain the nature of the present publication. It consists of a sketch of the Life of Xenophon and a translation of the Anabasis (with maps and index), which, along with much other matter now excluded, formed the earliest volume of my translation of Xenophon's works.

As to the object of this reprint, it has been pointed out to me that there are many readers to whom a version of Xenophon's most famous work, The March of the Ten Thousand, would be welcome, if presented in a more accessible shape.

As to the Life, which I have once more ventured to insert, it will form, I hope, a not unfitting Introduction to the author's treatise. Xenophon's Anabasis was, in the opinion of the greatest ancient critics, not only a true story of heroic adventure ; but, by a somewhat subtle interblending of "truth and poetry," a kind of Apologia. In my own contribution towards the biography of the man and the history of the times in which he lived, I trust I have at any rate helped to provide the younger generation with sufficient data for a just appreciation of the author : his character as a man, his genius as a soldier, his true position in the several spheres of politics, philosophy, and letters.

THE MARCH OF THE TEN THOUSAND

The opportunity has been taken to make sundry minor corrections both in the Life and in the Anabasis, but I have made no attempt to recast the one or the other as a whole. As I have already said, this is a reprint, not a revised edition.

H. G. D.

HASLEMERE, May 1901.

NOTE

The larger edition of The Works of Xenophon, translated by H. G. Dakyns, 4 vols. Cr. 8vo (Macmillan and Co.), is referred to in the following pages thus : "Xen. Works, I. etc."

CONTENTS

	PAGE
NOTE EXPLANATORY OF MAPS	. Next page
A SKETCH OF XENOPHON'S LIFE .	i
THE ANABASIS, BOOK I. .	i
BOOK II. .	39
BOOK III. .	67
BOOK IV. .	97
BOOK V. .	132
BOOK VI. .	167
BOOK VII. .	196
INDEX	241
NOTE ON ANABASIS V. III. 4 .	265

NOTE EXPLANATORY OF MAPS

EAST OF BABYLONIA.

[To face p. 38.]

This is taken from Edward Stanford's map, based on surveys of ancient Babylonia, etc. made by order of the Government of India in 1860 to 1865, by Commander W. Beaumont and by Lieutenant W. Collingwood, and Lieutenant J. B. Bewsner, and others made by Felix Jones, I.N., compiled by order of H.M. Secretary of State for India in Council by Trelawney Saunders, F.R.G.S. Geographical Assistant India Office, 1885.

THE COUNTRY AROUND SCILLUS.

[To face p. 140.]

This map is drawn chiefly from that accompanying the account of excavations at Olympia by Kaupert and Lepfeld, supplemented from the 1:300,000 map of Greece issued by the Military Geographical Institute of Vienna. Ancient sites and roads are shown in red. Heights, of which but few are obtainable, are expressed in English feet above the level of the sea.

ROUTE OF THE TEN THOUSAND.

[To face p. 240.]

Chiefly from Dr. H. Kiepert's map of the Asiatic Provinces of the Ottoman Empire, published in 1884, and the route maps of Dr. Sterrett, published in 1886. The route has been carefully laid down in accordance with present topographical knowledge of the country, and where it differs from the route, as drawn on Dr. Kiepert's latest wall map of the Persian Empire, that route is shown by broken red lines. Better surveys are required before we can satisfactorily lay down the tracks between the Pylae Syriae and Thapsacus, and between the Phasis and Gymnias.

A SKETCH OF XENOPHON'S LIFE

B.C.

circa 431, BIRTH.—(The first year of the Peloponnesian War.)

431-424, INFANCY (aet. 1-7).—Till the eighth year of the war, his life was probably spent in Athens, at any rate during spring and summer.

423-415, BOYHOOD (aet. 8-16).—Spent possibly partly in the country (at Erchia, modern Spata); religious training τῷ πατρίῳ νόμῳ (Anab. VII. viii. 5, see below, p. 237); old-Attic vocabulary; education in μουσικὴ γράμματα γυμναστική; gnostic; sophistic; may have "heard" Prodicus of Ceos; introduction to Socrates.

415-413, YOUTH (aet. 16-18).—Socratic training, illustrated by Memorab., Symp., Oeconom.

413-411 (aet. 18-20).—Hunting education, illustrated by Cynegetica.

411-405 (aet. 20-26).—Political interests, illustrated by Hellenica, I. and II. (A).

405-403, YOUNG MANHOOD (aet. 26-28).—N.B. There are two conversations in Mem. (II. viii., vii.), named as belonging respectively to the end of the war, 405 B.C., and the "year of anarchy," 404-403.

403-401 (aet. 28-30).—Political prospects, from the amnesty to Cyreian expedition. Cynegetica possibly published now; and the portion of Hell., I.-II. iii. 10 (see Xen. Works, I. pp. 1-50; also Note C on Hell., p. lviii. foll.), constituting the παραλειπόμενα or sequel to Thucydides, being got ready for publication.

401-399, MANHOOD (aet. 30-32).—Floruit; the advance with Cyrus and the retreat of the Ten Thousand; the Thracian campaign; surrender of the remnant of the Cyreians, six thousand men, to Thibron; illustrated by Anab. and Cyrop., also Hell. III. (B).

399-394 (aet. 32-37).—Uncertain movements at this date (spring of 399 B.C.); Hell. I. and II. (A) published (?); Asiatic campaigns with Spartan harmosts, Thibron (?), Dercylidas, Agesilaus; marriage; exile; sons; return to Europe, 394 B.C. before Coronea; illustrated by Hell. III. iv. (B).

B.C.

394-387 (aet. 37-44).—With Agesilaus in Sparta and campaigning (?); sons educated in Spartan training; till perhaps peace of Antalcidas (?); illustrated by Hell. IV. v. 1-36 (B); and Lac. Pol.

387-371, MIDDLE AGE (aet. 44-60).—Presented (now or perhaps earlier, 389 B.C.) by Spartan authorities, with a house and farm at Scillus, where he resides for many years, acting probably as proxenus for his adopted state; intellectual floruit, great literary period; illustrated by all his writings in some form or other. Many, e.g. Memor., Symp., Oeconom., Hiero, were here published; the material for the remaining portions of the Hellenica was being got together currente calamo; and material for later works, some of which were nearly ready for publication, e.g. Anabasis, revised.

371-369 (aet. 60-62).—Battle of Leuctra; the Anabasis published after expulsion from Scillus, and Hellenica B (= Hell. II. iii. 11—V. i. 36), perhaps in the year 371 B.C., after Leuctra, possibly at Corinth, where the family finally settled. The sons going back to Athens after the decree of banishment was rescinded, probably in 369 B.C., served in the Athenian cavalry at Mantinea 362 B.C.

369-362 (aet. 62-69).—Banishment rescinded; literary labours continued at Corinth (or possibly at times at Athens); Hipparchikos (or a Cavalry General's Manual), with its sequel the περὶ ἵππικῆς (tract on Horsemanship), both published; the Cyropaedia and Hellenica C (= Hell. V. ii. to end) put into shape and finally published between 365 and 357 B.C. (epilogue to Cyrop. after 364); death of Gryllus before Mantinea 362 B.C.

362-354, OLD AGE (aet. 69-77).—The Agesilaus, B.C. 357 circa. His last work, the Πόποι or tract on Revenues, published 355 B.C.

circa 354, DEATH (aet. 77).—He died at Corinth (tradition says); see Demetr. Magn., ap. Diog. Laert. Life of Xenophon.

"THE SAGE AND HEROIC XENOPHON."—GIBBON.

"Life may as properly be called an art as any other ; and the great incidents in it are no more to be considered as mere accidents, than the several members of a fine statue or a noble poem."—FIELDING.

BOYHOOD AND EARLY MANHOOD, 431-401 B.C. ; INFANCY, 431-424 ; BOYHOOD, 423-415 ; YOUTH, 415-405 : YOUNG MANHOOD, 405-401 B.C.

XENOPHON was an Athenian, of the dême (or borough town) Erchia, and therefore a fellow-townsmen of his illustrious contemporary Isocrates. His father was named Gryllus, his mother probably Diodora.¹ By his own marriage he had two sons, named respectively Gryllus and Diodorus. They were famous in their day, and were popularly called the Dioscuri, or great twin brethren. Possibly they were twins. But of them presently.

The date of Xenophon's birth is, as elsewhere² explained, uncertain. For the purpose of this sketch it is assumed that he was born about the commencement of the Peloponnesian war in 431 B.C. (possibly a little earlier ; not improbably even somewhat later).

With regard to his early bringing-up, the status of his family, the means and occupation of his father, we know next to nothing. It is commonly believed that Xenophon was qualified to serve as a knight. Tradition³ says that he did so serve. He had all the tastes of an Athenian country gentleman or yeoman, of the type presented to us by his own Ischomachus,⁴ devoted to dogs and horses, and the breeding

¹ See Roquette, de Vit. Xen., Append. II., "de Xen. Matre," p. 109 foll.

² See Xen. Works, I. p. xlix. Note B.

³ Diog. Laert. ii. 5, Vit. Sacr. 7 ; Strabo, IX. ii. 7.

⁴ See Oecon. vi. 17.

and training of these, and to hunting as a preliminary to warfare.¹ He took horses with him on the famous expedition under Cyrus; and it was he who, at a critical moment,² organised the small squadron of forty horse, which proved so effective during the retreat. His interest in this branch of the service is unceasing, and is evident in many passages of his works. As an old campaigner he seems to have taken τὸ ἵππικόν under his special protection, and he ended by writing two companion treatises on the subject, the earlier of which, "A General of Cavalry," is addressed apparently to one of the hipparchs for the year at Athens—possibly about 365 B.C.—when his two sons were serving as knights in the state cavalry. If this was the status of the family, we may suppose that his parents had means; and it is clear³ that Xenophon set off on the expedition above named in quest of glory and adventure rather than of wealth. The question, as we shall see, is important in reference rather to his political leanings than to his economical surroundings.

We may, perhaps, assume that the boy was reared in easy circumstances and as befitted a καλός τε καὶ ἀγαθός,⁴ a "beautiful and good" citizen of Athens. We may assume further that he was piously and healthily brought up. The grown man, we know, was religiously and healthily disposed;⁵ and the child, we suspect, was herein father to the man. But we have also a suggestive anecdote which throws light on the family worship in the home of Xenophon in the rural dême of Erchia. It is recounted on page 237 of this volume, and I need not repeat it; but it is noticeable that Zeus Meilichios, to whom the old family soothsayer Eucleides bids Xenophon sacrifice "in the ancestral fashion," is the same god who was honoured in the festival of the Diasia;⁶ and the incident may

¹ Cf. de R. Eq.

² See below, p. 83 foll.

³ See below, pp. 171, 181.

⁴ See Becker, Charicles, Excursus to § 1, "Education."

⁵ See Diog. Laert. Life of Xen.; Anab. passim.

⁶ The Diasia was a country festival existent long before the festival of Olympic Zeus, as Cylon in his attempt upon the Acropolis found out to his cost. And, to skip from grave to gay, the name recalls not only the tragic end of Cylon, but the tragico-comical experiences of the old Athenian country gentleman in the play (Aristoph. Clouds, 408 foll., 864) trying to soften the obdurate heart of his horse-racing youngster by reminding him how, when he even throw a ray of light on the old-Attic propensities (etymological or other) of our author.

LIFE OF XENOPHON

We may further surmise that the health of his body was no less thought of than that of his soul. The love of field exercises and the chase; the belief in bodily training and the salutary effects of toil, summed up in one of his mottoes οὐδὲν ἄνευ ἰδρωτός, date back to childhood.

If he was born in 431 B.C. and was in Attica at all, the first years of his life, or a great part of each year, must have been spent inside the city walls. The distances in that whole country are indeed so small that the owner of an estate even at Thoricus might have returned to his farm at intervals after the Laconian troops had done their work of devastation for one year, and before they returned on the same errand the next, so that the child may well have breathed fresh air during some months in every year.¹

He gives no hint, nor indeed had he perhaps any vivid recollection, of the earlier troubles incidental to the "Archidamic" war. He is equally silent touching things which he might well have recollected as he grew in years. As far as was a little boy and could only lisp, his father had bought him a little go-cart at the festival of the Diasia. Strepsiades, the father, bears no further resemblance to Gryllus than that he is an old man from the country; nor, except in his love for horses, does Pheidippides recall Xenophon. (He is more like a famous Athenian, with whom Xenophon has been sometimes confounded, Alcibiades.) But, for the peep into Attic life which it affords, with its contrasts of old and new, rustic and polite, during the age of the Sophists, the whole play is an apt commentary upon the times of Xenophon's boyhood.

The anecdote of the Anabasis is suggestive not only of a religious but of an old-fashioned style of bringing-up; and, if I am not mistaken, even the phraseology of Xenophon bears an impress also of that ancient style of education so much commended by the Dikaïos Logos in the play already referred to. How is it that Xenophon is so glib in the use of old Attic words and inflections? why is it a chance whether he will say πεπᾶσθαι or κεκτῆσθαι, and why does he persist in writing βελέων, ὀρέων, etc.? Why does he call the goddess of dawn Ἡώς as the poets do, and not Ἑως as the rest of the world does? I know that there are other answers to the question, but I cannot help thinking that it is because, at an age at which the boy could only lisp, such were the sounds familiar to his ears in his father's family, and amongst the peasantry on the eastward face of Brilessus (Pentelicus), in the rural dême of Erchia.

¹ It was no great distance from Athens to Erchia (not nearly so far as to Thoricus) if, as is supposed, the site of the dême is that of the modern Spata. By the modern road it cannot be more than seventeen or eighteen miles. See map.

foreign invasions were concerned, his out-door training might well have begun in earnest at the age of seven (the eighth year of the war), 424 B.C., and have been continued steadily till the first year of the "Deceleian" war, 413 B.C., when he would be eighteen years of age. Then for ten years it must have ceased entirely, or nearly so. In his tract on hunting (which as some think was his earliest work)¹ he says in a style somewhat pedagogic for so youthful a writer: "My advice to the young is, do not despise hunting or the other training of your boyhood, if you wish to grow up to be good men, good not only in war, but in all else of which the issue is perfection in thought, word, and deed." And before plunging into practical details, he adds: "The first efforts of a youth emerging from boyhood should be directed to the institution of the chase; after which he should come to the rest of education—provided he have the means and with an eye to the same; if his means be ample, in a style worthy of the profit to be derived; or, if they be scant, let him at any rate contribute enthusiasm, in nothing falling short of the power he possesses."

Whether he himself enjoyed this education, or is only inculcating what he regarded as desirable, and was able eventually to give to his own sons at the proper time of life, we cannot say. What we can say is that his description of the chase in this treatise (as far as coursing hares is concerned) would suit the slopes and gullies of the Attic mountains (of Parnes, Pentelicus, and Hymettus) no less than the scenery of the Triphylia, of Pholoe and the hills which stand about Olympia.

Apart, however, from this exceptional form of gymnastic, and provided always that his boyhood² was spent in Attica and Athens, we may suppose that he was subjected to the common training of young Athenians at that time. "We have been companions in the chorus, the school, the army," is the telling appeal with which the herald of the mustai, Cleocritus, challenges the city party on a memorable occasion to cease strife with the exiles in Piraeus.³ We may picture Xenophon as a boy sharing in choruses, or wending his way to school, or going through the exercises of the palaestra and gymnasium with the Critobuluses and Euthydemuses, who were his fellows, just as when older he probably shared in military drill and service—whether with horse or shield—and in the first instance perhaps among the περίπολοι.¹ At school he would learn γράμματα and μουσική and γυμναστική, according to the system in vogue. He would come to know the poets—Theognis and Hesiod and Epicharmus—and, beyond all, Homer. In all ways he was brought up, I think, in the ancient style, as far as was then possible, and whatever else was the result of this education, the main point was secured. The young man had formed in his breast the image of Aidôs. For the rest his training in the new learning of the Sophists was, for a youth of his temperament, by no means detrimental. Rather it was of the best. It is quite possible that, like Callias or Proxenus,² he paid fees to some one of the professors to whom he introduces us in the Memorabilia and elsewhere. Perhaps Dionysodorus taught him tactics. Perhaps he heard Prodicus of Ceos. But it was a greater than Prodicus who truly initiated him into such philosophy as he was capable of, and who taught him how to discover the first principles not of strategics only but of a much higher art—that of right living—and of καλοκαγαθία in general. This teacher, himself the greatest of the Sophists, and yet in a deep sense antagonistic to all other professors of wisdom—one also to whom he certainly paid no fees of money—it need hardly be said, was Socrates.

¹ See Cynæg. i. 18; ii. 1. If this was really an early work, I think it must have been re-handled and re-edited in middle age. See below, p. lxxvii.

² See a story in Philostratus, Vit. Soph. i. 12, according to which he lived part of the time as a captive in Boeotia.

³ See Hell. II. iv. 20.

At what age Xenophon came under the influence of this friend and teacher, we cannot tell; we may suppose, however, that he was emerging from boyhood, and had done with paidegōgoi, in the technical sense, when this new and spiritualising influence was brought to bear upon him. If we are to guess at a date, we might choose that famous year 415 B.C. (the seventeenth of the war), in which the expedition sailed for Sicily, and Alcibiades, being accused of profaning the mysteries, was condemned to death in his absence. Socrates himself would then have been fifty-three, Plato would have been fourteen, Alcibiades about thirty-four, and Xenophon about sixteen. Whenever it happened and however the introduction came about, the change wrought in the young man's disposition was deep and permanent. The story is prettily told by Diogenes Laertius, and with so clear a ring of poetic truth that we need not stay to inquire whether the particular incident occurred. This is how the biographer recounts the matter: "Xenophon was modest of mien, and surpassingly fair to look upon. Tradition tells how Socrates met him in a narrow way, and stretching his staff athwart him, so as to bar his passage, plied him with inquiries as to where this or that commodity was to be purchased, to all which questions the boy answered fluently; when the sage at length put to him a final question, 'And where are the fair and noble to be found?' The boy shook his head¹ in perplexity. Then said he, 'Follow me, and be taught.' So he followed him, and thereafter became his hearer."²

¹ A sort of horse patrol composed of young Athenians between eighteen and twenty to guard the frontier.

² See Symp. v. 4, 62; Anab. V. vi. 16, p. 141; Mem. III. i. 1, II. i. 21.

The question so propounded became indeed the problem of Xenophon's life. Where are the καλοὶ καγαθοί to be found? And what is that perfection of combined beauty and goodness, displaying itself in beautiful and good deeds, otherwise called virtue? That to some extent he solved it will perhaps be admitted by whoever has noted the distinctive quality of his writings and the persistent ambition of his life. The answer which the "inspirer" himself was prepared to give to his "hearer" may in part be read in the Recollections and other "Socratic" writings of Xenophon; and still more largely in the dialogues of Plato. The attitude meanwhile of the pupil to his friend during ten or fifteen years of his life is easy to picture.³

¹ Lit. "raised his brows," precisely as a modern Greek does, expressing blank surprise.

² Diog. Laert. Life, § 2.

³ It has indeed been pictorially represented by that most famous painter of the Renaissance, whose sympathetic mind unerringly interpreted to him the spirit of the Greeks. In Rafael's School of Athens, among the six or seven figures which compose the Socratic group, that of Socrates himself is so truly depicted as to form a companion to the portrait of the philosopher as drawn by Alcibiades in the Symposium of Plato. Of the rest, none are more truthful to the imagination than those of Alcibiades and Xenophon. The helmeted mail-clad warrior facing the philosopher with exquisite proud poise, indicative of a graceful

The best commentary on this period of Xenophon's life is to be found in his own Socratic writings, and chiefly in the Memorabilia. That work is an honest attempt to explain the character and position of Socrates to a public who seemed to misconceive of him; and, being based mainly on the writer's personal recollections, is replete with autobiographic matter. It must be borne in mind, however, that none of these writings were published, nor in any technical sense composed, until long after the death of Socrates, which took place in 399 B.C. Even the most matter-of-fact of them, therefore, the Memorabilia, cannot escape a certain colouring. Socrates is seen through a vista of years. The young man's memoranda, however faithfully preserved, represent also the mature reflections of one who has himself gone through many experiences, since as a youth he sat in some saddler's shop and imbibed words of wisdom, and whose own character is formed. With this caution we may well turn over the pages of the Memorabilia, etc., in confidence that the story of Xenophon's own deeper education lies therein. There is, indeed, one specially autobiographic passage,¹ in which the author names himself as an interlocutor in a conversation (which took place between Socrates and Critobulus), the subject of which may be called "the danger of a kiss." Possibly Socrates had observed in Xenophon a certain propensity, which in his ironic fashion he thus set himself to counteract. The incident appears to have clung to the mind of him whose judgment was appealed to.

Besides this, there are endless occasions on which Xenophon suggests his own presence at a conversation by such phrases as, "I will here mention what I once heard him say about the divine power;"² or, "As I listened to these sayings I could not but reflect that he himself had attained, whilst we his hearers were being led onwards, to true happiness;"³ or again, in order to show how Socrates helped his friends out of self-confidence on the very verge of insolence, is unmistakable; but beside the latter, with back-turned face, hanging on his lips, is a youth with rosy cheeks and auburn hair; he leans on one arm in a brooding attitude; his eyes are set in deep, earnest, religious gaze. That is Xenophon, the future apologist of the life of Socrates, treasuring one of the discussions of the Memorabilia.

¹ Mem. I. iii. 12.

² Ib. I. iv. 2.

³ Ib. I. vi. 14; cf. I. vii. 5; II. i. 1, iv. 1, v. 1, vi. 1.

SKETCH OF THE

their difficulties, varying the treatment to suit the need of the case, he recounts three or four stories, "which he can personally vouch for" (ἐρῶ δὲ καὶ ἐν ταύτοις ἃ σύννοιδά αὐτῷ).¹ The two first of these are, it so happens, the only two in the whole collection of which the exact date is given in so many words—the one is named as belonging to the end of the war 405 B.C., and the other to the year of division which followed—before the city party and the party of Piraeus had healed their differences.² To others we can approximately assign the date through internal evidence; some are dateless. But our suspicion is that the mass of these conversations which Xenophon recounts on his personal authority belong to his maturity, say to the years 411 B.C. and onwards.

By that date (411 B.C.) Xenophon had doubtless begun to take an interest in politics (as what Athenian did not?), and was perhaps meditating some essay in literature. The prospect of continuing the history of Thucydides had not as yet dawned upon him; nor could he as yet foresee the need which would come of writing an apology for Socrates. But I make no doubt that he already had an eye to current affairs; and in the spirit of Boswell was duly taking notes of conversations which he felt to be of permanent interest.

It may be hard at times, as already suggested, to distinguish between the later reflections of the middle-aged man of letters and the original impressions of curious youth; but the fact remains incontestable that this was the period of seedtime. The particular word or words in which the good seed was sown; the exact moment (to use a more Socratic phrase) at which birth was given to some struggling idea, we may not be able to discover; but we have Xenophon's own testimony to the educational effect of this discourse or that discussion upon the minds of those who, like himself, consorted with Socrates, and we can hardly doubt that he was generalising from his own experience. If he says that to listen to such and such remarks was to be led on a step farther in the direction of καλοκαγαθία, or self-restraint, or wisdom, or courage, or trust in the Gods, or belief in the omnipresence of Divinity, or acquiescence in the supreme will, he means that he himself

¹ Mem. II. vii., viii., ix., x. 1.

² See Hell. II. iv.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

cussions themselves, some, it must be admitted, savour somewhat of the after-reflection of a mature commentator ; and from a biographical point of view are no less illustrative of the veteran at Scillus than of the young man at Athens. Such is a series in Mem. II. on the relations of parents and children. "How should a son behave to his mother?" or "Concerning brotherly affection." But these are just of a sort to mark the intimate relations between the teacher and the pupil at the time. They form a chapter of the private life of Socrates revealed to a friend. There is no reason why they should not be also verbatim reports at first hand. Others read like authentic records of actual descriptions related to Xenophon by an intimate friend. The two conversations between Euthydemus and Socrates in Bk. IV. are good specimens. Another set suggest either that Xenophon himself, or some one very like Xenophon, was the interlocutor. The sentiments of the disputant might well have been his at the time. Such are the two in Bk. III. ch. ii. and iii.—Socrates and a young man on the duties and ambition of a strategos and of a hipparch respectively. (We are close upon autobiography here, I think.) Others, again, discover the artist working up his material to the best advantage (and occasionally perhaps in a way which offends our sense of dramatic propriety). How often is not Xenophon tempted consciously or unconsciously to impress his own personality upon some one or other of his dramatis personae? There is a final class, of which the Economist may be taken as a highly-developed type, which read as if the artist had at times got the better of the biographer. It is hard not to believe that in the conversation between Socrates and Pericles the younger (one of the unfortunate generals at Arginusae, it will be recollected), Xenophon has contrived dramatically to represent the workings of his own mind upon the subject of debate. Just as the Economist is perhaps an expansion of some actual Socratic conversation with a view to a freer handling of the topic, so this particular discussion (setting forth the pessimistic views of Pericles concerning the Athens of the moment, in contrast with the more hopeful views of Socrates touching an ideal Athens of the future) might well have been worked up into a political pamphlet in praise of the Solonian institutions.¹ Between these two voices it is possible to detect the workings of Xenophon's own mind. One may hear or overhear his thoughts excusing or else accusing one another politically. Such a discussion may actually have taken place—and Xenophon may have listened to it probably between 411 B.C. and 406 B.C., by which time his own miso-Theban views were probably already pronounced.

But it was not to Socrates alone that Xenophon's introduction to politics was due (though to make his friends statesman-like was, as we know, a great object with that teacher); there were other go-betweens of all sorts, human or metaphysical. Demonic forces were leading him on, and fixing his views for better or for worse. These were pre-eminently the current incidents of the time (some of which he has graphically enough described). There were also the prepossessions and intellectual propensities of the individual. What Xenophon's leanings were we can scarcely doubt. He is one of those thinkers to whom we may perhaps apply the modern term "aristocratic" without doing his departed spirit an injustice.² In the arena of ancient politics he watches impartially the behaviour of the combatants in their strife for glory; but his eye is fixed most readily on the doings of the βέλτιστοι, whether the state be friendly or hostile. The better classes were better than the rest of the world. That is axiomatic; at the same time he admits Socratically the sad truth: Corruptio optimi pessima est. Nor does his admiration of respectability fill him with prejudices against the ναυτικὸς ὄχλος of Piraeus, whose good discipline on shipboard delights him. It does not blind him to the fact that in a deeper and more philosophic sense the free man may be a very slave in soul and the slave-born man win to himself a patent of nobility. But, on the whole, and with large deductions due no less to his human-heartedness than to his artistic sense (to which, as to some high court of equity, he may appeal against the prejudices of an Athenian knight or hoplite), he is of the school at Athens of Theramenes.¹

¹ Such a treatise would have been an apt counterpart of the so-called Lacedaemonian Polity, a pamphlet in praise of the institutions of Lycurgus. As to the Athenian Polity, see Xen. Works, II. It was written by perhaps a cleverer, at any rate a more Machiavellian, person than Xenophon.

² Could he revisit earth and study modern literature, I think he would find the doctrines of Thomas Carlyle most congenial to his political mind; but to his aesthetic and philosophic soul in general the style and sentiments of John Ruskin.

What part, if any, the future historian of the period himself played in public affairs from 411 B.C. to the date of the amnesty, whether or not he shared in the troubles of the Four Hundred or in those of the Thirty, we cannot say. It is quite possible that, in accordance with a tradition mentioned by Philostratus, he was during part of this time a prisoner in Boeotia. Wherever he was, it is certain that his political views were all the while shaping themselves. If merely from a literary and artistic point of view, he could not fail to note with curiosity the course of events, the import of which, whether at home or abroad, was alike momentous. The plot thickened apace. The spectator was not of a temperament to sit by perfectly unmoved, or unbiassed in his judgment. Perhaps, like the youthful Ion in the play of Euripides, he wished to hold himself aloof, ἐν πόλει ψόφου πλέα.² But however loath he might be to plunge into affairs at the sacrifice of that "dearest boon to mortals—leisure," he was at the same time a youth of some ambition. He had studied to make himself an adept in speech and action. The question must ere long present itself to his mind, How was he to turn his political training to account?

On the whole, and apart from the dramatic interest of them, the incidents of these years offered no encouraging prospect to a man of his disposition. There were the events of 411 B.C. The government of the Five Thousand might perhaps have satisfied him, could it have lasted.¹ In that best of modern constitutions, in which oligarchy and democracy were duly attempered, and the reins of power lay in the hands of those who could furnish themselves with arms, Xenophon might have hoped at the age of thirty to find a sphere of usefulness. But the limited democracy did not last for more than one year. Again in the spring of 404 B.C. could the young philosopher have stopped the wheels of time, just when the Thirty commissioners were chosen to draft a constitution based on the ancestral laws of the state; could he have forced them to carry out the duty imposed on them, we can readily imagine the type of polity which he would have had established. As a matter of fact the commissioners had no intention of setting up a Neo-Solonian democracy, nor yet an aristocracy; they were bent upon the methods of tyranny. Yet even so their first high-handed measures against 'sycophants' might perhaps be winked at, but the introduction of a Laconian bodyguard under a creature like Callibius was past forgiveness. Xenophon would have been no true pupil of Socrates if his horror of sycophancy and the make-believe of statecraft had not been counterbalanced by an instinctive repugnance to tyranny and lawlessness. Some of these commissioners might have possessed the rudiments at least of political sagacity—they were not simply empirics; but unless they added to these elements the right moral diathesis which distinguishes the true ruler, they had not the ἐπιστήμη of government, their technical knowledge was in vain. Critias might be the fit subject of a moral treatise: corruptio optimi, but he was no true governor. Where then was stable government to be found? Not in democratic Athens, where the voter was ignorant and government depended on the lottery of the bean. Was it perchance to be found in Sparta? or was Xenophon rather indulging a philosophic dream of a new Athens, a novel association of states in a renovated Hellas, in which the naturally cohesive force of virtue should as by some elective affinity bind together the souls of the élite; where there should be an ideal combination of all the καλοκάγαθοί in the state, or in society at large, to help each other, and in generous rivalry to dominate and regenerate the world? Was not that the meaning of what Socrates had been saying to Critobulus about friendship?¹ Thus he ruminated.

¹ So, after Mr. W. L. Newman (The Politics of Aristotle, vol. i. p. 491), I name the more moderate wing of the popular party at Athens during the years 411-403 B.C. (see Thuc. viii. 97. and Xen. Hell. II. iii. 43. cf. Plato, Laws, 753 B). For the doctrines of this "left centre" party, with many of which Aristotle himself sympathised, see op. cit. p. 470 foll. They may be summed up in the phrase ἡ διὰ τῶν μέσων πολιτεία: and by the μέσοι we must understand the moderately well-to-do classes in the state intermediate between the very rich and the very poor. Another "left centre" tenet attributed to Theramenes is that the well-wishers of a constitution must be stronger than its opponents if the constitution is to stand, op. cit. p. 491 and note; see also Xen. Hell. II. iii. 19, 20, 42, 44. compared with Aristot. Pol. 7(5)9, 1309 b. 16 seq.; 8(6)6 1320 b. 25 seq. The above seems a fair conclusion to draw from the tone of the first two books of the Hellenica.

² See Eur. Ion, 601, and with the boy's speech, cf. Xen. Mem. III. vii. 5 and Cyrop. I. ii. 3.

¹ See Thuc. vii. 97.

But how was his own φιλοτιμία to express itself? One may easily make a grave blunder in answering such a question touching a man in whom the artist ever predominated over the citizen. If we may judge from hints scattered up and down his writings, or from the analogy of other young Athenians at the time (one thinks of Proxenus as described by Xenophon himself, of Mantitheus in the speech of Lysias, of Alcibiades as depicted in the Alcib. major of Plato); or lastly, from the next chapter of his own life, as narrated in the Anabasis, he took a supreme interest in the problem of ἀρχή.² If he could not rule in his own person he would like to divine the secret of rule, and to discover the "archic" man. His moralising habit of mind, moreover, led him to divide the world into good and bad, or to accept with readiness the old political party catchwords.³ For some reason the popular party at Thebes, whose scheme was to absorb the other Boeotian states, appears to him in an evil light. Even after the restoration and in spite of the good turn they did to the exiles, he cannot get over his natural antipathy to this border state; and amid the home troubles he could not help being driven to certain generalisations. In these lie the germs of the political philosophy of the mature man.⁴

These speculations, which had occupied his mind for half a dozen years, were rudely interrupted by the anarchy of the Thirty. Presently we are in the turmoil of civil war. What, if he was at Athens, was the occupation of Xenophon

¹ See Mem. II. vi.

² See Index "Xenophon."

³ Theognis, 31-38; cf. Mem. I. ii. 20; Plato, Meno, 95 D; Aristot. Eth. ix. 9; and see Mr. Symonds' remarks on the meaning of ἐσθλοί and ἀγαθοί, κακοί and δειλοί (Greek Poets, i. p. 89).

⁴ As seen in his reflections on the Laconian or Lycurgean institutions or the ideal oligarchy; the despotic man; the archic man. These form the theses of three existing works. The work on the Solonian institutions—which he might have written—was never achieved. Perhaps this was a matter too close home.

then? We should like very much to know whether he was employed in the cavalry or otherwise, and how he comported himself. His sympathies as a historian seem to be with Thrasybulus. But on the whole we are most struck by the healthy impartiality of the narrative, the chief defect of which is that it omits to tell us all we should like to know. The author seems to draw a long breath of relief at the end of Bk. II. ch. iv., "The Amnesty." In his own writings there is a gap between the second and third books of the Hellenica, commonly so called, which is only partially covered by the incidents of the Anabasis.

We are led to ask ourselves, what happened to Xenophon in this interval—between the summer of 403 B.C. and the spring of 401 B.C. At that latter date we know that he had taken a momentous resolution, and had started on an adventurous quest with his old friend Proxenus, and his country's ancient enemy, the younger Cyrus. In taking this step he was not free from misgivings, if only because he acted against the better judgment of the friend whom he most trusted. What put him to it? In the absence of real information we are once more thrown back upon conjecture. The explanation, if we can divine it, lies in the character and ambition of the man. Many things perhaps combined at this date to make the invitation of Proxenus attractive: the promptings of his physical temperament, his belief in energising, his political bias and curiosity (since Cyrus was reported to be an "archic" man), his somewhat vague but at the same time noble yearnings after reputation—these on the positive side; and on the negative, a sense perhaps of limitation at home, unless he were to strike out a new line of his own. He was not, we suspect, enough of a student to sit down quietly and work out his literary salvation in the closet (as did his contemporary Isocrates). He was not so essentially a soldier that he would have accepted the career of an Iphicrates or a Timotheus had such a chance come in his way. Perhaps he reasoned with himself that just now he had a right to indulge his natural appetite for adventure. It was an appropriate moment at which "to cross over to Asia and meddle with Asiatic affairs,"¹

¹ See Plato, Alcib. I. 105.

since at this juncture the interests of Sparta and the new democracy were one ; and if the voice of conscience whispered, "But Cyrus is the arch-enemy of your state," he might have said to himself, "It is an old story now," ἀλλὰ τὰ μὲν προτε-τύχθαι. But it was the touch of knight-errantry in his composition, probably, which, combining with friendship for a friend, enabled him to connive at the antecedents of Cyrus.¹

MANHOOD, 401-387 B.C. ; THE "ANABASIS," ETC., 401-399 B.C. ; UNCERTAIN MOVEMENTS IN ASIA WITH AGESILAUS, 399-394 B.C. ; AT SPARTA, 394-387 B.C.

THUS he took the resolution, and with lightness of heart, if in humbleness of soul, set sail. He was under the protection of Zeus the Saviour and of Heracles the Leader ; what then need he fear ? Perhaps in secret he nursed an Achillean hope, "But my fame shall be imperishable," as with an attendant soothsayer he started from Ephesus to join his friends at Sardis, ¹ The thought suggests itself that he may really have served as a knight under the Thirty. Doubtless there had been many "left centre" democrats so employed, but as a body that class of citizens was not in good odour. No mischief befell them except that some of them had to forfeit their allowances (κατάδοταις), and when the opportunity arrived the more conspicuous instruments of the Thirty were sent off on foreign service under the Spartan harmost Thibron in 399 ; somewhat, as it would seem, in malam rem. However neutral the part which Xenophon, on this hypothesis, had played, his political career at Athens would have commenced (he may have felt) under difficulties in spite of the amnesty, which from himself we know was, for the matter of that, religiously observed. But this is pure speculation. There is another point. Either now or possibly on his return to Europe in 399 B.C., he seems to have had an interview (at Megara) with another enemy of the democracy, the Spartan Lysander. So I gather from the expressions put into the mouth of Socrates in the Economist (Oec. iv. 20), which must surely refer to some personal experience of the author. If this interview took place and now, Lysander naturally had fine stories to tell about Cyrus. According to another hypothesis, Thucydides perhaps died in 403 B.C., and Xenophon had for the last year or so been busily employed in editing his great predecessor's works, and supplementing them by his own Paraleipomena (Hellenica, Bks. I. and II. iii. 10). At the end of that literary labour he was in need of a holiday. If so, a shooting excursion in Pisidia in the company of Proxenus and this fine fellow Cyrus was just the thing for him. His warmth in the matter is shown by the manner in which he consulted the god (see below, p. 68) ; his too late repentance (seeing that the thoughtless step led to exile) by the remark, possibly, in Memorab. 1. i. 4. But this again is pure hypothesis.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies needed. Either in dreams¹ or sacrifices, by birds, or voices, or by something encountered on the path, they graciously make known their will to him. A modern man may smile at the machinery of divination; but, as bearing witness to an inner need of our common humanity, he will welcome the childlike trustfulness and reverence of the pious Athenian captain.

Another trait of this period may be spoken of as the awakening of dormant ambition in the breast of one who was too diffident to snatch at honour, but on whom honour was thrust. We can follow the growth of this sentiment from the moment when it became apparent that the raid into Pisidia was a pretext, since Cyrus was flying at lordlier game than certain irrepressible hill tribes.

Perhaps at Issi or at Myriandus Xenophon might have withdrawn, as he was free to do. But like Proxenus,² if in a less degree, he felt under an obligation to his host; he had laid his hand to the plough, and it was base to turn back. Curiosity in itself was a further incentive, as the military aspect of the expedition grew in fascination. How far was this boasted Persian empire open to attack?³ Lastly, there was doubtless a personal side to the matter. It was but natural to forecast events. Cyrus in his free-handed way had promised crowns and satrapies to his Greek officers.⁴ He, Xenophon, though unofficially attached, would certainly not be forgotten. He would return home with enlarged experience, and the wherewithal to benefit a friend. The death of Cyrus dispelled these fancies. But others of a more permanent character took their place. Between the battle of Sept. 3 and the passage

¹ One of these signs has already been mentioned, nor need I forestall the reader's pleasure in picking them out for himself. They are of real psychological interest. In particular, the dreams—that on the night of the seizure of the generals, or that other (a θῆνος διαβατικός) at the passage of the Centrites—help us to follow the workings of his mind. They remind one of St. Paul's vision of the man of Macedonia (Alexander the Great?), dreamt in the vicinity of "sacred Iliion," and were in a spiritual sense "veridical." See for this, and for other traits of character—e.g. his strategical skill; his combined tact and eloquence; his philanthropy exhibited towards barbarians no less than the Cyreians; the awakening of his personal ambition; his colonisation schemes; his respect for law and authority, his μετριοφύλα—Index "Xenophon."

² See pp. 49, 69.

³ See p. 19.

⁴ See p. 24.

of the Tigris (Oct. 5), a month of suspense intervened. The brains of the young scholar or philosopher were working the while. He was duly taking note of the surroundings.¹ The germ of a colonisation scheme,² which was never realised indeed but never laid aside, belongs to this interval. So, doubtless, does the germ of that lordlier undertaking, which in the fullness of time was amply realised—the conquest and absorption by Hellas of the Persian empire.³

The murder of the generals on the fatal 22d of October transformed the theorist into the man of action. In the visions of that night a new spirit bred of sharp necessity and true courage entered him. A voice summoned him to the leadership in a forlorn hope. In obeying the call he found himself not in name only, but after a brief apprenticeship, in very deed, what he had aspired to be, a ruler of men. The story of his generalship is told with ample detail in the four last books of the Anabasis, and need not be repeated here. I confine myself to general observations.⁴

¹ We shall find traces of this in his latest works. See Cyrop. passim. His notes are those of an intelligent traveller, observant of men and manners and scenery, with a taste for sport. But he has further the keen critical eye of the war correspondent or military attaché. See pp. 19, 48, etc. In the Cyropaedia we traverse the same ground and fight the old battles over again.

² For the gradual working out of this project, see p. 80, note 1, and p. 180 foll. He cherished it all his life as we suspect. At Calpe it seemed on the point of realisation, but at a sudden turn of affairs (the advent of a Spartan admiral) the dream melted into thin air. The rock fortress which was to have become an independent little state with great powers of expansion and the happiest future before it, had to be deserted. Its abandonment was evidently a blow to Xenophon's ambition, but it is not his habit to repine. Self-effacement of a sort is easy to him.

³ We discover both, in the reflection how easy it would be to plant themselves as a military colony in the heart of Babylonia, p. 79. In its immediate conception strategical, this project presented a philanthropic side. Such a colony, wherever planted, would serve to draw off a portion of the surplus population from his native city and to diminish pauperism (see Rev. i. 1). To be the (oecist or) founder of such a settlement would have satisfied the personal ambition of Xenophon. But there was no chance of gratifying it at present in the basin of the Tigris.

⁴ The reader who wishes rapidly to piece together the leading personal details can do so by turning to the Index and reading what is there given under the name of "Xenophon." The authenticity of the story is another matter. There is, I believe, no just ground for doubting it. The part which Xenophon assigns himself is somewhat idealised; but these were the facts. This indeed

The path of leadership is glorious but beset with peril. According to Xenophon's mature reflection, it can only be trodden with absolute success by the real prince;¹ and the qualities requisite are not to be found in ordinary mortals. That he was able himself to play the part with credit for a season must be ascribed at once to his native Attic ability and to his Socratic training. To Athens he owed that happy combination of eloquence and confidence with soldier-like resource and bravery,² which his countrymen regarded as the natural outcome of their democratic institutions. To Socrates may be traced those ruling qualities of sympathy and human-heartedness, and that readiness to take the lion's share of fatigue and danger, which won him the obedience and affection of the soldiers. This volunteer was no pretentious charlatan, else they would soon have exploded him. Nor was he a mere rule-of-thumb tactician and drill-sergeant, or it would have fared but ill with him and them. He had, it was soon seen, a real gift of inventiveness and a sound economic sense.³ An instinct told him how best to adapt the means at his disposal to a given end; and that too in the face of ancient methods.

is the charm, or one charm, of the Anabasis. It contains, as I have elsewhere suggested, not only a graphic account of a notable episode of Greek history, but it constitutes a chapter of autobiography in which the personal element subserves to the general dramatic interest of the narrative. Without being unfaithful to Clio, the muse of history, the author uses his tablet and stylus in the service of her sister Calliope. And of his own prose epic he is the central figure. So he behaved. Such was the real meaning, the true interpretation, of his intent and conduct. From another point of view, the interest of the Anabasis centres in its military problems. It might have served, like the Commentaires of Blaise de Montluc, as a "soldier's breviary" or vade mecum. It was not the Anabasis, however, but the Cyropaedia, a work based to a great extent on the Anabasis, which Africanus carried about with him. See Cic. Tusc. II. xxvi. 62. "Semper Africanus Socraticum Xenophontem in manibus habebat, cujus imprimis laudabat illud (Cyr. I. vi. 25), quod diceret, eosdem labores non esse aequè graves imperatori et militi, quod ipse bonos laborem leviores faceret imperatorium." Cf. Ep. ad Q. Fratr. I., I. viii. 23. "Quos quidem libros non sine causa noster ille Africanus de manibus ponere non solebat: nullum est enim praetermissum in his officium diligentis et moderati imperii."

¹ "The Archie Man." See Cyrop. I. i. and vi. passim; Hipparch.; also Mem. IV. ii. 11.

² The words are Grote's, H. G. ix. p. 117, 1st ed. See also Curtius, H. G. (Eng. tr.), iv. 130.

³ μηχανικός. οἰκονομικός. See Mem. III. i. 6; IV. ii. 11.

Whatever his prior military experience may have been, he had studied in no narrow-minded spirit. He was all the more apt to learn the handling of troops in the school of experience. If, for instance, the ground which they were forced to traverse were not suitable to the evolutions in vogue, it seemed a matter of sound sense, no less than of generalship, to suit their tactics to their novel circumstances. Opportunities for such modifications of method in march and battle daily presented themselves. The experience so gained was of permanent value. If, therefore, it is to the credit of the Ten Thousand collectively that they were able to face blithely a long series of ever-shifting difficulties, it is equally to the honour of Xenophon and his colleagues that the strain was not greater. To him and them attaches the glory of the pioneer. They are reformers in the art of warfare. How far Xenophon can be fairly regarded as the monopolist of these reforms is not an easy question. It is he, however, who has explained them to us, and they savour of his inventiveness.¹

But apart from these traits of originality, self-devotion, and alertness—characteristic in themselves of the archic man, there is no doubt that Xenophon possessed what he himself would have regarded as the sine qua non of success in leadership.² This special qualification of the Hellenic happy warrior he had in his pious disposition. His, as I have already said, was a quite child-like faith and a trust in divine providence. This attitude of mind did not render him superstitious or inactive.

¹ They carry the hall-mark, as one may say, of his particular genius, bearing a strong family likeness to the literary innovations which his Written Works exemplify. As to the tactical reforms in question, they were discussed at the council of war by all the generals, etc., and the whole board must have the credit of their adoption. But it is almost certain that the prime mover was not unfrequently the Athenian. This seems to have been the opinion of the ancients, though there is no direct contemporary evidence in proof. It is also the opinion of important modern authorities. What seems quite certain is, that the modifications in the handling of heavy and light infantry and cavalry, and the combined evolutions of these troops, which were presently adopted in Greek warfare, e.g. in some of Agesilaus's battles (in Asia and at Coronea), were primarily due to the experiences of the Ten Thousand. See Rüstow and Köchly, Gesch. d. Griech. Kriegerwesens, p. 158 (note 19), and the references to Xenophon and other authorities there given, Anab. V. iv. 22, p. 144; Ages. ii. 9-14; Hell. IV. iii. 15; Plut. Ages. 18; Diod. xiv. 84; Polyaen. ii. 1, 4; 6, 19; Frontin. ii. 6, 222.

² See Cyrop. I. vi. 46.

It did not leave him open to the chicaneries of every lying soothsayer.¹ On the contrary it gave him confidence in the practical affairs of life and a sense of security in dark places.² It enabled him also to acquiesce in the many personal disappointments which at this period awaited him. It saved him from the torture to which certain sympathetic natures are liable, the consciousness of talents wasted in fond subservience to the will of others. But the disappointments were very real. It is a proof indeed of his literary skill that he can present them so vividly without wearying his readers by the enumeration of them.

These were, to put it briefly, the offences which must needs come to a man like Xenophon so exceptionally circumstanced. Some may be traceable to a certain weakness in his nature, since, as above suggested, he was (to apply language of his own) to some extent dipsychic and the cherisher of incompatible desires.³ The larger portion of them, however, were the outcome of what was most honourable to him, his insatiable striving after honour.⁴ The rest spring out of the inevitable misunderstandings of the situation. It must be, in so motley

¹ See Cyrop. I. vi. 2, and see p. 155 for a practical illustration.

² So at any rate he seems to feel; and one may well believe. It did not of course instruct him ethically. It did not precisely quicken his social or his political conscience. How should it? By which I am far from implying that these stood in any special need of quickening. His feelings towards slaves and "barbarians" are markedly philanthropic. His anti-Theban bias is the common narrow-mindedness of active political partisanship. It, like the rest of his political shortcoming, is compatible with an exalted pan-Hellenic patriotism, resembling that of Lysias and Isocrates.

³ Incompatible desires.—E.g. he wishes to return home, but he will not abandon the army—or go against the will of the God—or he does not find it easy to break with the Spartan governors. His proper respect for vested authority looks at times like subservience; or is his vacillation owing to a growing sense of insecurity at home? (See below.)

Φιλοτιμία: his chief ambition is to rule and to obey. τοῦ ἀρχειν τε καὶ ἀρχεσθαι: to do or share in some famous deed. The successful conduct of the advance—and still more so, of the retreat—ought surely to redound to their credit and his. That is his hope. To found a colony is a scheme which appeals to his sense of economy. It is a practical thing to do. It leads to honour. To possess a sea-board fortress is a more simply self-regarding scheme. By the end of the year 400 B.C. he has come to regard himself as a possible rolling stone. He is in the category of the mercenary captains, or may be. This idea seems to have occupied his mind only during the last winter, when his hopes of fame were beginning to dwindle and his apprehension of certain Spartans and of Pharnabazus had grown large.

⁴ See Cyrop. passim; Hiero, vii. 3.

a host and with so many rival captains, some generous and others the reverse, in eager competition, that offences against an Athenian private gentleman without followers to back him should come; so soon at least as the immediate difficulties were past and there was time to attend to private advantages. This did not make them the less bitter. With Xenophon at least we shall agree that the elemental forces of nature were not so hard to battle with as those various moral evils which beset the army from Trapezus onwards. As to himself personally we can well understand that the tooth of an Armenian or Scythian winter did not bite like a fellow-man's ingratitude. But underlying the last books of the Anabasis is the sense of something more than disappointment. I think we must call it a sense of disillusionment.¹ It is not spoken of tediously with many words; but here and there a phrase well suited to its context, like the echo of a sigh, pathetically reveals it. "Somewhere," he says, as he parts with the Thracian princeling Seuthes, to whom he has restored a kingdom and without reward, "somewhere I may rise to honour; and that shall redound to your gain also."² Let us consider this matter. I have already spoken of the colonisation scheme. The abandonment of it was on each occasion doubtless a blow to his hopes.³ "For myself I have done with that dream," betrays the feeling of a sacrifice. But to turn the troops to so good an account—to become famous as the oecist of a new and thriving settlement—was not his sole personal ambition, nor its abandonment his only act of self-sacrifice. It was only part and parcel of the more general ambition which he cherished. He cared much for the good name and fame of his fellow-soldiers.⁴ For himself, he hoped that some echo of his success as a commander might be borne on the wings of fame to Hellas: that, to use his own phrase, he might one day reach his native city⁵ and find his name writ large.⁶ At a certain date in the month of

¹ This is intelligible enough when we bear in mind that the work itself, or, at any rate, a portion of it, could not have been finally composed until long after the years (401-399 B.C.) in which the incidents took place.

² See page 236.

³ Page 156.

⁴ Page 162. "The praises we expect to win from the mouths of men."

⁵ Page 170.

⁶ The desire to return home is first expressed in the speech at Cotyora,

May (400 B.C.), whilst the army lay at Harmene, the port of Sinope,¹ and the proximity to their goal brought self-regarding feelings to the surface, it looked for one moment as if Xenophon were about to reap the first-fruits of a well-earned reputation. After a public meeting of the soldiers, the sole generalship was formally offered to him. But this honour, gratifying to his personal vanity, had, in obedience to the will of heaven, to be foregone. Firmly, and without repining, he put it aside. Yet he makes no secret of a certain perturbation. However plain the duty—however salutary the consequences—of self-effacement in the future, for the moment his hopes were disappointed. There were other disappointments of a similar sort in store for him—before Byzantium—at Selybria, and again during his service under Seuthes. On every occasion the higher—at least the more reasonable—nature of the man wins an easy battle over some subordinate inclination. Zeus is ever his saviour; Heracles is his guide.

It must, however, be admitted that these triumphs are somewhat at the expense of self-assertiveness. I do not mean that Xenophon ever ceased to be a man of action. If he sometimes let "I dare not" wait upon "I will," the hero within him reasserted itself. It was never swallowed up by the philosopher. But at times that nearly happened. What between his sense of fairness on the one hand, and his infinite regard for law on the other, his will was kept in abeyance. This man has none of the self-aggrandising dash of Alcibiades. For vested authority he has an infinite respect. It is astonishing how readily he accepts the hegemony of Sparta at this period, as if it belonged to the eternal order of the universe. It is thus that, externally at any rate (though with his inner being it is quite otherwise), his life becomes as it were the plaything and sport of fortune. Thus we find this great Athenian captain playing the ignoble part of tennis-ball to rival Spartan harmosts. When he has a chance to return home his desire to keep the army together, in compliance with the schemes of June 400, in which he abandons the colonisation scheme (p. 156). It is repeated at Heraclea in July; but the design is vetoed by Heracles (the Leader) (p. 175). Again, in August, at Chrysopolis; and at Byzantium, August to October (pp. 196, 197-201). Again, in February of the next year, 399 B.C., on leaving Seuthes (p. 236).

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

In the spring of 399 B.C. Xenophon, if not himself altogether a different person, is differently conditioned from the youth who in this same month of March just two years ago set out from Athens to join Proxenus and Cyrus. Both these friends and many others were dead. Socrates was at the point of death.¹ In what direction should he turn now, this man with his Achillean aspirations and his Odyssean cautiousness; his almost Socratic independence in things of the soul, his sophistic scrupulosity, or should it be said, his Attic ἀγχινοία in practical affairs? In a material sense he was more free to move, but politically he was more isolated. If he had now at last something in his pocket wherewith to benefit a friend, was he likely to find his name written large in the hearts of his own countrymen? would he even be welcomed as a virtuous citizen at home? There the tide of conservative reaction was setting in apace. The most deserving section of the party—the saviours of the Democracy—were naturally well-disposed to Thebes; the citizens in general resented the leadership of Sparta. Was the Democracy for ever to play a secondary part? Was not empire the birthright of Athenians? On the whole, and however great his natural inclination to return home,² this was scarcely an opportune moment for a citizen of his antecedents to think of establishing himself at Athens. It is Xenophon himself who bears witness to the generous and reasonable behaviour of the restored Democracy.³ It is he who has recorded a significant incident, which serves to illustrate the spirit of the times. Among the troops of Thibron, he tells us, was a contingent of cavalry sent out by Athens, as her quota, in obedience to the ruling power. It consisted of those knights who had been of special service to the Thirty. In thus obeying the mandate of Sparta the home authorities were probably stirred by two desires. They wished, on the one hand, to deal justly by people of opposite politics, and, on the other, to be rid of political firebrands. In the language of the historian, they believed it would be a gain to the Democracy for these people to see some foreign service, and if it cost them their lives it was no great loss.¹ The feeling of the authorities towards these knights was a straw to show which way the wind blew, and if Xenophon had contemplated returning home in hopes to find his name writ large, perhaps the talk of these men and the story of Socrates' fate served to disenchant him. The latter tragic incident, whenever and wherever the news reached him, must have come as a great shock to him. He does not talk about it. Neither in the Memorabilia nor elsewhere does he speak angrily of the accusers, still less so of the Athenian public,² least of all does he allow any note of personal resentment to obtrude upon the solemn sadness of an irretrievable loss.

¹ Socrates drank the hemlock in May. It is not probable that Xenophon ever saw him again. When and where he heard the account of his trial and condemnation, we cannot tell. Perhaps with other considerations it combined to determine his movements now.

² See the last two books of the Anabasis, passim (pp. 156, 175, 196, 197, 201, 236). Grote thinks that he did return for a short while, during which time he brought out his Paraleipomena and then returned to Asia, rejoining the remnant of the Cyreians under the Spartan harmost Thibron or his successor Dercylidas. Others have thought that he did not return at all, or that he got no farther on the homeward journey than Megara, where he would have heard from the Socratics what fate had befallen their friend. There is something plausible in this last view of his movements. He probably had his papers to put in order; and possibly a book to publish. If so, was it now that he interviewed Lysander? See above, p. xviii.

³ See Hell. II. iv. 43. As Grote points out, the verse of Aeschylus τραχὺς γε μέντοι δῆμος ἐκφυγὼν κακὰ especially did not apply to the restored Democracy. See H. G. viii. p. 415 (2d ed.).

Whether he returned to Europe or not during the spring or summer of this year, it seems certain that he was back in Asia before its close. The internal evidence derived from certain books of the Hellenica (III. and IV.)³ appears conclusive on that point. In some way, officially or non-officially, he was connected with the Spartan harmosts in Asia off and on for five years (399-394 B.C.)—if not with Thibron himself, to whom he had surrendered the six thousand Cyreians, at any rate with Dercylidas first,¹ and later with Agesilaus. With this latter,² in the year 394 B.C., he certainly did return to Europe, and was present consequently, whether he fought or not, at the battle of Coronea.

¹ αἱ δ' ἐπεμψαν τῶν ἐπὶ τῶν τριάκοντα ἱππευσάντων νομίζοντες κέρδος τῇ δῆμῳ, εἰ ἀποδημοῖεν καὶ ἐναπόλουντο. What actually became of them we do not know.

² As he reflected on this matter later in life he was able to form a perfectly considerate judgment. It was in a fit of jealousy (pardonable in frail humanity) that the Athenian public had acted. Dêmos, as a bon père de famille, had turned against the philosophic tutor who had stolen the affections of his darling son. This is the apologue of the allusive passage in the Cyropaedia (III. i. 38-40). The bons pères de famille are represented by the Armenian. His son Tigranes is the youth of Athens, whom the philosopher had "corrupted." Cyrus is the outer world interested to discover the real explanation of so sad a story.

³ As the minuteness of detail implying the personal knowledge of an eye-witness seems to show.

This was a momentous period in Xenophon's life. Within its scope fall to be considered not only his marriage and the birth of his sons, but his exile and that which in connexion with his exile closely affected his whole after-life—a new friendship with the Spartan king Agesilaus.

To speak of these in some order. The date of his marriage can be approximately fixed³ as falling in the year 399 B.C. or soon after. Who his wife was, we do not know. One may suspect that he found her in the Aeolid, perhaps in the pleasant home of Hellas, the wife of Gongylus, or of some other of his Pergamene friends; but this is mere guesswork. She may have been a foreigner, or she may have been an Athenian, a native of the Aeolid, or one of those women who had shared in the campaign. There is no saying. That she became the mother of two noble sons named Gryllus and Diodorus, we know; and that her own name was Philesia. Possibly the boys were twins, as their Spartan sobriquet The Dioscuri suggests. They were popularly named "the great twin brethren," and became famous. As to Philesia herself, their mother, she is, we suspect, the prototype of some one or other of those delightful women worthy of Zeuxis and Euripides, whom Xenophon has depicted.⁴ Perhaps it was of her

¹ See Hell. III. i. 6; ii. 7.

² See Anab. V. iii. 7 (p. 140 below); Hell. IV. iii. 15; Plut. Ages. 18.

³ I speak here of his marriage with Philesia, the mother of his two sons Gryllus and Diodorus. It is possible that she was his second wife. And if we could accept it as authentic, the pretty story repeated by Cicero (de Invent. i. 31) on the authority of Aeschines, the Socratic (cf. Quintil. V. ii. 27), of a dialogue between Aspasia, Xenophon, and Xenophon's wife, would imply that he had been married before he left Athens in 401 B.C.; indeed so many years before that we should be driven to 440 B.C. (circa) as the date of his birth. But the conversation is doubtless imaginary. So, too, is the Soteira of one of the epistles, commonly held to be spurious. Stob. Floril. 3. 29.

⁴ And Heywood, the Elizabethan, reproduced. See below, p. lx.

he thought when he drew the portrait of the wife of Tigranes, "who went soldiering with her own man," in the Cyropaedia. As might be expected, we get no hint from Xenophon himself in these matters; nor does he once have occasion to name his wife. Such silence is only natural and common. It is, of course, quite compatible with the existence of those happy relations which, from the pen of Xenophon himself, best of all Greek writers, we know to have subsisted between husband and wife in ancient Greece.¹

If, as seems probable, Xenophon and Philesia were married in 399 B.C., we may perhaps be warranted in assuming that their two sons were born to them within the next two years—possibly both in 398 B.C. or 397 B.C.; or, if not twins, within a year of each other, the elder in 398-397 B.C. and the younger in 397-396 B.C.; so that at the date when their father left Asia with Agesilaus on the perilous expedition of 394 B.C., the two children would still be at their mother's apron-string. Perhaps for a couple of years the family life was so far broken up that the mother and children remained at home in Asia, whilst the father followed the fortune of his friend the king of Sparta in Europe. But in 392 B.C. it recommenced, and as fortune willed it, was happily continued for many years; first in Sparta itself and afterwards at Scillus.²

In this summary application of the almanac to the private life of our author, we may seem to have too long neglected the stormier question of his public bearing and his banishment. To this we come.

If we do not know the precise date of Xenophon's marriage, still less do we know the date of his banishment; and if we are ignorant as to the date, still more are we ignorant as to the cause and circumstances of that occurrence. The ancients themselves¹ attributed it in some way or other to institution of Lycurgus : Which ἀγωγή the Spartan lads commenced at the age of seven. Plutarch's Words are : " He (Agesilaus) kept with him Xenophon the philosopher, and made much of him, and proposed to him to send for his children and educate them at Sparta, where they would be taught the best of all learning ; how to obey and how to command " (Clough, 4. 24). This Xenophon appears to have done. It will fulfil the conditions best if we suppose that Xenophon on leaving Asia in 394 B.C. had left his wife and children there (at Ephesus or elsewhere). Or, to state the matter chronologically : Supposing that his marriage took place in 399 B.C., and that the children were born both in 398-397 B.C. (or at an interval of a year) ; in 392 B.C. they (or the elder of them) would be about six years of age, and almost ripe for the Spartan public schooling, which commenced at the age of seven. See Plut. Ages. xx. Ξενοφῶντα δὲ τὸν σοφὸν ἔχων μεθ' ἑαυτοῦ [Ἀγησίλαος] σπουδαζόμενος ἐκέλευε τοὺς παῖδας ἐν Λακεδαιμόνι τρέφειν μεταπεμψάμενον, ὡς μαθησομένους τῶν μαθημάτων τὸ κάλλιστον, ἀρχεσθαι καὶ ἀρχειν. See Roquette, Xen. VII. I. § 5. p. 25.

¹ See, in particular, the relations of Ischomachus and his wife in the Economist; the Cyropaedia, passim; and for Xenophon's views as to τεκνοποιία and the education of children, see in addition to the above-named works Lac. Pol. 1; Mem. I. iv. 7.

² The evidence for the date of Xenophon's marriage and the birth of his sons is as follows:—(1) We know on the best authority (from Anab. VII. vi. 34. p. 227) that he was not married, or at any rate had no children, in February 399 B.C. (2) We further know, on the authority of Plutarch in his life of Agesilaus, that, at some interval between 394 and 381 B.C. (see Hell. IV. iv. 19), when Xenophon was with Agesilaus in Sparta, his sons were (not only born, but) of an age to be initiated into the public training according to the

¹ It will be best to cite the ancient authorities :—

Besides two passages in Xenophon himself (Anab. V. iii. 7. and VII. 57), which must be considered in reference at least to the date (see pp. 140, 236), we have the statements of three ancient authorities, none of which are very close to the times of Xenophon. The earliest is Dio Chrysostom (the famous rhetorician of the Flavian era, 100 A.D.), who tells us that " Xenophon was exiled owing to his expedition with Cyrus," Ξενοφῶν ἐφυγε διὰ τὴν μετὰ Κύρου στρατείαν (viii. p. 130 M) but how, why, or when, he does not explain. The next is Pausanias, the archaeologist, etc. (160 A.D.), who adds a suggestion. " Xenophon was banished by the Athenians as having shared in the expedition against the king, their well-wisher, with Cyrus, who was the bitterest foe of the Democracy," ἐδιώχθη ὁ Ξενοφῶν ὑπὸ Ἀθηναίων ὡς ἐπὶ βασιλέα σφίσιν εὖνοιον ὄντα στρατείας μετασχὼν Κύρῳ πολεμωτάτῳ τοῦ δήμου (v. 6, 5). There seems to be some hope of a discovery here, but it is after all delusive, since, as Grote points out, Artaxerxes only became εὖνους to Athens in 396 B.C., and Xenophon's friendship with Cyrus was an old story then. The last authority is Diogenes Laertius. He has two references to the matter. The first is contained in one of the two epigrams which he wrote in honour of Xenophon (see Xen. Works, I. p. xlv., and below, p. 68), in which occur the words Κέκροπός σε πολῖται φεύγειν κατέγγων τοῦ φίλου χάριν Κύρου, " Thee Cecrops' citizens condemned to exile for thy dear Cyrus's sake " (Diogenes Laertius, Life of Xen. § 14). The other occurs a little earlier (in § 7), where he tells us that " after the ' Anabasis ' and the occurrences in Pontus (in the ' Catabasis '), and the breaches of faith on the part of Seuthes, the king of the Odrysians, Xenophon came to Asia to Agesilaus, the king of Lacedaemon, and presented him with Cyrus's soldiers for pay (i.e. as a mercenary force)." [This is clearly a blunder, since he came to Thibron in 399 B.C., to whom he handed over the Cyreians, and to Dercylidas later on in the year, and to Agesilaus only in 396 B.C.] " It was at this time " [what time? 399 B.C. or 396 B.C.?] he adds, " that he was condemned to exile by the Athenians on the ground of Laconism : μετὰ δὲ τὴν ἀνάβασιν καὶ τὰς ἐν τῷ Πόντῳ συμφορὰς καὶ τὰς παρασπονδήσεις τὰς Σεύθου τοῦ Ὀδρυσῶν βασιλέως ἦκεν εἰς Ἀσίαν πρὸς Ἀγησίλαον τὸν Λακεδαιμονίων βασιλέα, μισθοῦ τοὺς Κύρου στρατιώτας αὐτῷ παρασχών, his friendship with Cyrus, or (scarcely less vaguely) to his φίλος τε ἦν εἰς ὑπερβολήν, παρ' οὗν καιρὸν ἐπὶ Λακωνισμῷ φυγὴν ὑπ' Ἀθηναίων κατεγνώσθη. Diogenes is an unsatisfactory authority, and generally contrives to confuse matters through carelessness. But on the whole we must admit that his testimony, like that of the other two authorities, is positively in favour of an earlier date than 394 B.C., and negatively of a less pronounced form of Laconism than would have been Xenophon's presence with the enemy of the allies and Athens at Coronea. On this intricate question the modern authorities are nearly equally divided. Thus Grote is quite clear that the sentence of banishment was not passed until after the battle of Coronea, which took place in August 394 B.C.; and he states clearly the grounds of his opinion in H. G., vol. ix. 242 note 1, which he reiterates as an historical fact in Plato, III. xxxix. p. 566. Curtius, on the other hand (Eng. tr., vol. v. p. 149, bk. vii. ch. ii.), takes an opposite view.

"Thus Xenophon when probably not more than thirty years of age entered the service of Cyrus, and was unexpectedly called upon to perform duties of high importance, in which he exhibited so much efficiency that his fame even radiated itself upon Athens. And yet by what he did he incurred the loss of his native city; for probably about the time when proceedings against all anti-constitutional tendencies were resumed at Athens (vol. iv. p. 142 and when Socrates was sentenced, Xenophon was by a popular decree deprived of his civic rights as a partisan of Cyrus; possibly a diplomatic consideration for the wishes of the Persian king contributed to bring about this decision," etc. With this in the main I agree. I will only add a note on the two passages in the Anabasis above referred to. The first occurs on p. 140 and note 4. The words run thus: Ξενοφῶν δτε ἀπῆει σὺν Ἀγησιλάῳ ἐκ τῆς Ἀσίας τὴν εἰς Βοιωτοὺς ὁδόν, καταλείπει (τὸ τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος μέρος) παρὰ Μεγαβύζῳ . . . καὶ ἐπέστειλεν, ἣν μὲν αὐτὸς σωθῆναι, ἐαυτῷ ἀποδοῦναι ἣν δέ τι πάθῃ, ἀναθεῖναι ποιησάμενον τῇ Ἀρτέμιδι ὃ τι οἴοιτο χαριεῖσθαι τῇ θεῷ, Ἐπεὶ δ' ἔφευγεν ὁ Ξενοφῶν, κατοικοῦντος ἤδη ἐν Σκιλλοῦντι, ἀφικνεῖται Μεγάβυζος. . . . It has been asked by those who rely on this passage to prove that Xenophon was banished after 394 B.C., "Why should he mention his banishment at all in this context, if it had occurred five years or so before he set off with Agesilaus to Europe?" To those who are not satisfied with Thirlwall's explanation (see H. G. iv. ch. xxxiv. p. 357. and in reference to Anab. V. iii. 7. Xenophon, Niebuhr, and Delbrueck, Philol. Mus. vol. i. p. 516), I would suggest that the expression is natural enough, if at the date of publication of the Anabasis the sentence had been rescinded. It is highly probable that this was the case. Xenophon was, I think, forced to leave Scillus, and settled in Corinth soon after the battle of Leuctra, 371 B.C. The sentence of banishment was rescinded not later, I think, than 369 B.C., possibly earlier; and the Anabasis published almost simultaneously. But this will need further discussion (see Xen. Works, III. part ii.). In any case I do not consider the inference to be drawn from Anab. V. iii. 7 conclusively in favour of 394 B.C. And the suggestion, if in that direction, may be met by the suggestion of Anab. VII. vii. 57: Ξενοφῶν δὲ οὐ προσῆει, ἀλλὰ φανερόν τῃν οἴκαδε παρασκευαζόμενος· οὐ γάρ πω ψῆφος αὐτῷ ἐπῆκτο Ἀθήνησι περὶ φυγῆς. Which surely implies that the incident of his banishment did presently prevent him from carrying out his intention to return home. The only escape from that conclusion is to suppose that the words οὐ γάρ πω κ.τ.λ. are an editor's note—Wrongly inserted in the text—a footnote, as it

Laconism.¹ But in what particular way this Laconism was shown, or how and why either Laconism or friendship with Cyrus should have brought upon him a sentence of exile, is at the present time altogether a matter of conjecture. Under the circumstances it will be fairer at once to Xenophon and to my readers, if I state here my own conviction that the sentence of exile was passed soon after the events recorded on the last page of the Anabasis (p. 240 of this volume), and that the gravamen of the indictment lay, as the ancients put it, at once in his former friendship with Cyrus and his present (or late) inclination towards Sparta, the ancient enemy of the Democracy. By "soon after," I mean within a year or two years (or three at the most). It seems to me not improbable that Pharnabazus himself, or some one of the great king's personal agents,²

Were, cautioning the reader, who thinks of Xenophon as a banished man, not to antedate the commencement of his exile. But that in itself is surely far-fetched. According to Grote he not only was free in 399 B.C. to return to Athens, but for a short while did so. But if so, why in recounting the incidents of 399 B.C. should he go out of his way to speak of a matter which could only affect his movements in 394 B.C.?

¹ Λακωνισμός = a leaning to Sparta, a philo-Laconian propensity or behaviour, not necessarily even in the sphere of practical politics treasonable; though often enough so actually or so regarded. Cf. οἱ βουλευόμενοι, οἱ ἀργολίζοντες, to express a party in the state favouring a particular policy. To understand Laconism, as I have elsewhere said, we ought to go to a somewhat analogous period—the Italy of the Republics, when Venice with her relative stability and oligarchical government = Sparta; Florence with her intellectual turmoil and political self-consciousness = Athens. The comparison might be worked out in detail. Vide Symonds, Age of the Despots, ch. iii. passim, and ch. iv. p. 236; also Freeman, Historical Essays, 2d series, p. 32.

² For the πολυπραγμοσύνη of these big men and the little men their agents, see Thucydides, and Xenophon, Hell. passim. See too the Anabasis for specimens of the petty scheming busybody and emissary such as Dexippus, Neon perhaps, Medosades, Heracleides. For the diplomacy of bigger men see the relations of Pharnabazus and Anaxibius, and again of that satrap and Aristarchus. As to the personal catastrophe, the tale told to Xenophon by Scuthes (p. 229) at a certain date, that Thibron meant to put him to death, though falsified by events, shows the sort of hazard which a man of some mark and scanty means might be supposed to run. Still more to the point is the actual risk either of losing his life or being delivered up to Pharnabazus (who had a horror of Cyreians), which befell him earlier, before Perinthus, at the hands of an evilly-disposed Spartan harmost (p. 204). One has only to imagine some Athenian or other of the Dexippus type worked upon by an emissary of Pharnabazus (as the Rhodian Timocrates was employed by the satrap Tithraustes in a grander affair, Hell. III. v. 1), or of his own motion working

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

modes, four thousand Peloponnesians, and the three hundred Athenian knights above spoken of. The Corinthians and Thebans were again recalcitrant. They would have nothing to do with the pan-Hellenic march. When the new Agamemnon Agesilaus in 396 B.C. proposed to offer sacrifice in Aulis, the latter laughed him to scorn, and treated the king of men and his sacrifices with prosaic effrontery. Certainly, as Pausanias tells us, they were but little affected by appeals to their gratitude.¹ Their grievances were too deeply seated. The Corinthians and Athenians more politely — but no less practically — for one plausible reason or another begged to be excused. Nothing has been said of Argos. There too, as in the three states already mentioned, political ideas were already² shaping themselves which eventually led to the coalition of 395 B.C.³ Pausanias seems to think that the excuse offered by Corinth was bona fide, but with respect to the Athenians in 397 B.C. he adds significantly that though they assigned the present weakness of the state and pestilence as the ground of their inability, the real reason was that they had already got wind of a visit of Conon, the son of Timotheus, to the court of the great king.

This visit is perhaps the key to the whole matter. It is unfortunate that we cannot fix the date of it more exactly. It was brought about by Pharnabazus, who as far back as 408 B.C., and under the influence in part of Alcibiades, was ready to procure the assistance of Persia for Athens rather than for Sparta. He failed indeed, but only owing to the stronger will and power of Cyrus, who elected for Lysander and Sparta, as narrated in Hellenica, I. iii. 8. Again in 404 B.C. the same satrap had lent himself to negotiations with Alcibiades, then in exile, the object of which was to further the interests of Athens at the court of Susa, rather than those of Sparta, which it could be shown were already unduly fostered by the rival satrap (or, to give him his proper title, the Karanos Cyrus). This history now repeats itself. It is no longer Alcibiades, but another distinguished Athenian exile, a man of less questionable patriotism, Conon, at the court of Evagoras, the prince of Salamis in Cyprus, who conducts the negotiations on the side of Athens ; but the satrap is the same.¹ In 397 B.C., as it would appear, if not in 398 B.C. summer (see below), during a truce with the Spartan Dercylidas, he repaired to Susa,² and by dint of a diplomatic correspondence which he set up between the court and the prince of Cyprus, he entirely altered the king's policy. The correspondence, it seems, was skilfully conducted by Ctesias the king's physician, and an important item of the new programme was the equipment of a royal navy, the command of which should be entrusted to Conon.³

¹ Pausan. iii. 9. 2.

² And even earlier.

³ Which was said to be brought about in part by Persian gold. See the tale of the Rhodian Timocrates sent by Tithraustes, the Persian satrap who succeeded Tissaphernes, and the thirty thousand archers. (The coins were stamped with the image of an archer.)

The prospect of so securing the goodwill of Artaxerxes, though not openly proclaimed, may well explain the reluctance of the Democracy to assist in any joint attack on Persia in 397 B.C. If we turn for a moment to home affairs,⁴ the feeling of the state towards certain wealthy oligarchical members is clear enough from the remark of the historian already quoted. To send off three hundred knights seemed to the ecclesia, even as early as 399 B.C., no bad riddance of bad rubbish ; or to speak more courteously, as Grote says, they were glad to see such people honourably provided for. In either case, it seems certain that between 399 B.C., or even earlier, and 397 B.C., the emancipation of Athens had commenced. As a subject ally of Sparta, and seeing that her walls were still dismantled, she was debarred from independent action, but an instinctive germinal foreign policy existed. This, as regards Hellas

¹ For the relations of Pharnabazus and Alcibiades in 404, see Grote, H. G. viii. p. 427. For those of Pharnabazus and Conon in 397 (or earlier), see Plut. Artax. Ctesias of Cnidos, the court physician, was also diplomatically employed in this matter, as the king's plenipotentiary. Didot. Ctesiae, fr. 29, § 63 (as preserved by Photius).

² See Hell. III. ii. 1, 398-397 B.C. ; Winter truce extended through summer, ib. ii. 9.

³ See Hell. III. iv. 1.

⁴ For internal affairs at Athens between 403 B.C. and 395 B.C., see among modern authorities, Grote, H. G. viii. ch. lxvi.; Curtius, iv. p. 142 foll. (Eng. tr.); Jebb. Attic. Or. vol. i., on Lysias, and passim; Thirlwall, vol. iv. xxxv. Among ancient authorities, Xen. Hell. III.; Lysias, Or. xxxiv., xix., xxvi., xvi., xxxi., xxv., xii., vi. (which is not by Lysias but probably by some contemporary), and xiii.; Ctesias, his fragments in Didot., and a passage quoted by Plut. Artax. (Clough, v. p. 443); Pausanias, iii. 9, 2.

proper, pointed in the direction of alliance with Thebes and other states fretting under Spartan predominance. As regards Asia and her former subject allies, it implied a readiness to meet the Persian king half way, in case he showed any desire to retaliate for Cyrus's attack upon the state which had aided it, whose power he had suicidally developed.

One must not make too much of a small matter; but to return to our biographical difficulty—it seems quite likely that some member of the ecclesia may at any moment after the return of the Ten Thousand have proposed the banishment of that Athenian who had most distinguished himself in the attack on Artaxerxes, whether he was a knight or not, and whatever the colour of his politics before he left Athens in 401 to strike up a quixotic friendship with the bitterest foe of the Democracy (τῷ πολεμικωτάτῳ), who had proved himself the worst foe also of the Persian king his brother. The conduct of Xenophon on his return to Europe might in itself be easily open to misconstruction. During the two years' absence he had to a great extent lost touch of home politics; or he did not allow sufficiently for the conservative reaction at home, and the recovery of national independence. To him the dominion of Sparta appeared to be solidly established; to the leaders at home it appeared to be assailable. Judging as he did that Sparta was the leading state, and that whatever a Laconian officer willed was law, he had somewhat coquetted with and humoured the navarchs and harmosts with whom he came in contact. It was not through lack of patriotism to his country, but out of loyalty to his fellow-adventurers, that he so adapted himself. It was from an amiable desire to save the reputation of the heroic band, and not their reputation only but their lives, that he so acted. But this action may have been misunderstood or misinterpreted.¹ Just as his detractors explained to the Laconian emissaries that he was too much the soldiers' friend, too popular in his manners, and would prove a thorn in the side of Sparta; so at home it might have been reported of him that he was too simply philo-Laconian. A better citizen would have done better by a fine body of troops than surrender them to Thibron. And what did it all tend to,

¹ At the end of the Thracian campaign (see p. 223).

if not to furthering interests which neither the Democracy approved of, nor the king, whose goodwill was worth conciliating, could be other than annoyed by?

It was thus, or somehow thus, as I imagine, that on the motion of Eubulus or some other citizen the decree of banishment was passed (between 399 B.C. and 397 B.C.) There was certainly no mystery about it at the time; nor does this view of the matter need any machinery of sycophants to support it. It implies no anti-oligarchic bias in the behaviour of the restored Demos—no overriding of the amnesty—nor indeed anything but what seems natural enough and was already foreseen in 401 B.C. by Socrates: a readiness to dispense with the services of so doubtful a citizen.¹

. The effect of it was to throw Xenophon more completely into the hands of the Spartan authorities, and led eventually to those close relations with Agesilaus, affecting the whole tenor of his future life, which it is now our business to consider.

It has already been suggested that in the spring of 399 B.C., after handing over the remnant of the Cyreians to the Spartan Thibron at Pergamus, Xenophon himself, being free to return home, returned to Europe, possibly to Athens, or more probably no farther than to Megara, where in the society of the Socratics and perhaps of the Spartan Lysander, he may have found time to set his affairs in order,² during the space of a month or two, after which he returned to the Aeolid. According to another view, which is quite as probable, he never left Asia at all at this season, but continued in command, actually or virtually, of the six thousand Cyreians, now amalgamated with the Spartan forces under Thibron.

¹ The offence, such as it was, was the consequence of an original false step, but under the circumstances it may well have been made to appear unpardonable. Friendship with Cyrus, and Laconism! We, too, know the force of political catchwords. We do not know, of course, how the charge was brought against him; what the procedure, or what the court was. But if he could have pleaded his case, or, better still, if Lysias could have pleaded it for him, we can guess the sort of topics he would have insisted on. He might have urged mutatis mutandis what he urged in the case of Mantitheus, with whose character Xenophon's is comparable, that "brilliant, ambitious young Athenian, burning to fulfil the Homeric ideal by distinguishing himself in council as in war; an Alcibiades made harmless by the sentiment of chivalry." See Sir R. Jebb, Attic Or. vol. i. ch. x. p. 247.

² E.g. there were his histories, Hellenica A (and the commencement of B [?]) unless already published, and notes for the Life of Socrates, to be attended to.

His presence at the scene of action is proved by the minuteness of detail with which he describes the successive campaigns of the following years (summer and winter), and by one or two suggestive phrases, in which he may be supposed to refer to himself. He had many friends in this part of the world. Here too he found that dearest friend of all, his wife Philesia.¹ Xenophon, whatever the date of his arrival, is very much at home in the Aeolid. His friendship with some of the leading families was helpful to the general; but the behaviour of the Cyreians was not altogether satisfactory to the allies, as we discover presently; and before the end of his term of office Thibron was superseded by Dercylidas (autumn of 399 B.C.), and eventually banished on a charge, preferred against him by the allies, of allowing his troops to pillage their friends. Dercylidas was a very different person. He is graphically described by Xenophon as an inventive and versatile diplomatist, who went by the nickname of Sisyphus.² He probably received the troops from Thibron in Ephesus in the fall of the year 399 B.C.; and at once began to turn to account the well-known jealousy subsisting between the two Persian satraps Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus. Making terms with the former in the south, he proceeded to attack Pharnabazus in the north. Diplomacy and a touch of animosity, since he owed the satrap of Phrygia a personal grudge, dictated this movement. Before the winter of 399 commenced we are back again in the Aeolid. Xenophon is certainly there too.¹ The dramatic skill of the writer is the chief matter of biographic interest here; and for literary purposes we must bear in mind that the experiences of these years, 399 B.C. and onwards, will eventually form the material not only for the remaining portions of his Hellenica, but also for the Cyropaedia and other writings. All these matters, grave or gay, are grist to the author's mill. This cannot be too emphatically insisted on. When and where he found leisure to take notes or pen paragraphs we may conjecture, but cannot positively state.²

¹ His intimacy with the Greek families descended respectively from Gongylus the Eretrian and Damaratus the ex-king of Sparta is established by what is narrated on pp. 238-240 of this volume (Anab. VIII. viii. 8-26), with which should be compared the account given of Thibron's prosecution of the war, now that he had received so stalwart an addition to his forces, and aided by the families in question. This is to be found in Hell. III. i. 5, 6. Thibron, who had no desire to cope with the Asiatic cavalry, seems to have clung to the high ground until the arrival of the Cyreians. After that he was free to descend into the plains. Pergamus, Teuthrania, and Halisarna, places which belonged to Eurysthenes and Procles the descendants of Damaratus, gave in their adhesion. Gambrium and Palaegambrium, Myrsina and Grynium, were brought over by Xenophon's friends, the brothers Gorgion and Gongylus (the sons of Hellas) respectively. Others Thibron took by storm, but balking at Egyptian Larissa, (see Cyrus. VII. i. 45), was ordered by the Ephors to march south into Caria (the satrapy of Tissaphernes).

² ἄνθρωπος δοκῶν εἶναι μάλα μηχανικὸς καὶ ἐπεκαλεῖτο δὲ Σίσυφος (Hell. III. i. 8).

Thus during these winters, and in the intervals of warlike operations, I can imagine that Xenophon all along found time for study. Here he jotted a note and there he composed a chapter, while for the rest, even on march or in the battlefield he had a clear head and a strong visualising faculty, so that many of the events recorded in his histories are as plainly given as if they had only the day before been written on the tablets of the brain. Vividness—that it is which gives the charm to these historical writings. The campaign in the Aeolid of Pharnabazus, in which the wily Laconian took eight cities in as many days and reduced Pharnabazus to terms, is of this sort.³ So is the next campaign in Bithynian Thrace during the winter of 399-398 B.C., in which we find ourselves once more in company with a contingent of Odrysians sent over by Seuthes. We know this part of the world already,⁴ and the ways of the folk.

The proceedings of the next year (398 B.C.) are not less graphically told as by an eye-witness; and here occurs one of the passages in which Xenophon appears to refer to himself. We are at Lampsacus; the Spartan commissioners have come

¹ "The very circumstantial details which Xenophon gives about the proceedings of Derkylidas against Meidias in the Troad seem to indicate that he was there in person" (Grote, H. G. ix. 294).

² The second part of the Hellenica (i.e. the history of events during 399-387 B.C.) was not finally put into shape for several years; and is one of the products, I take it, amongst several others of his Scilluntine leisure. The third part of the Hellenica (387-362 B.C.) was probably put into its final shape at Corinth or possibly at Athens.

³ Hell. III. ii. 1.

⁴ See Anab. VI. p. 176 foll., and VII. passim, p. 219 foll.; Hell. III. ii. 2-5.

to inform Dercylidas that his term of office is to be prolonged for another year. Reference is made to the late charges against the troops. The commissioners call a meeting of the soldiers and make plain to them the views of the home authorities. Such proceedings would not be tolerated—just dealing by the allies would not be unrewarded. To which the representative of the Cyreians ὁ τῶν Κυρείων προεστηκώς makes a highly Xenophontine answer. “We,” said he, “are the same men as we were last year; but we are under a different general. You need not look further for an explanation.”¹ Dercylidas having renewed the truce with Pharnabazus for the summer, is now off on an expedition to the Thracian Chersonese.² He goes through the territory of Seuthes and is hospitably entertained by him. Having fortified the Isthmus³ he is presently back again in Asia, and laying siege to Atarneus.⁴ This place he reduces in eight months—and garrisons as half-way house, and so returns to Ephesus—at the close of 398 B.C.

This winter (398-397 B.C.), again, may well have been spent by Xenophon quietly in Ephesus. It is perhaps the year in which his son (or sons, if twins) was born to him. It was the city, it will be recollected, of Xenophon’s patron divinity. Here was the great temple of Artemis. Here too lived his friend Megabyzus, the sacristan of the goddess. Hitherto Tissaphernes and Dercylidas had no quarrel; the barbarian and Greek population spent their days in peace. But at this date the Spartan government, urged on by the allies, determined to force the satrap to grant independence to the Hellenic cities. Dercylidas received orders to march into Caria. In combination with the Spartan admiral Pharax operating by sea, he was to attack Tissaphernes in house and home. The result of this movement on his part was a coalition between the northern

¹ Hell. III. ii. 7. See Grote, H. G. ix. 300, 301.

² Hell. III. ii. 9; cf. Diod. xiv. 39; see Grote, H. G. ix. 353. It was at this date, the summer of 398 B.C., that Pharnabazus, as I suspect, took the opportunity of paying a visit to the court of Persia. See above, p. xxxvii.; also Chron. Tables of Greek Hist., Carl Peter, p. 84 note 163, of Mr. Chawner’s translation.

³ See Anab. p. 154, also p. 2, of this volume.

⁴ A place occupied by Chian exiles (old friends of the Democracy perhaps), who harry Ionia (Hell. III. ii. 11). The officer left as governor or ἐπιμελητής, Dracon of Pellene, is named in the Panegyrikos of Isocrates, p. 70.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

night: the Asiatic to Tralles in Caria, the Hellenic to Leucophrys, where was a temple of Artemis most holy, and a sandy-bottomed lake more than a furlong broad, fed by a warm spring of water fit for drinking. The next day Dercylidas demanded the autonomy of the Greek cities; Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus the withdrawal of the troops from Asia and the harmosts from the cities. Both parties agreed to report progress; Dercylidas to the home authorities, and Tissaphernes to the king at Susa. There was truce meanwhile.

Here is a lull in affairs, during which the historian pauses also to chronicle the march of events in Europe¹ during the same space of time (401 B.C.-397 B.C.) He has to recount the coercive measures of Sparta in Elis, and the seizure of the Triphylia; the accession of Agesilaus, lame in body but whole of spirit, upon the death of Agis; the discovery of grave domestic discord and the conspiracy of Cinadon; the alarming news of a huge Persian armada, fitting out in Phoenicia, the object of which was unmistakable. This report reached Sparta as it were by accident. A Syracusan master of a merchant vessel (named Herodas), whilst trafficking in those regions, had seen the great galleys collecting and in all stages of equipment.² The excitement at Sparta was great. The allies were summoned, and war with Persia was resolved upon. The new king, Agesilaus, supported by Lysander,³ who wished to restore his Decarchies, accepted the duty of leading the host; and in the spirit of another Agamemnon, started. How he fared at Aulis has already been related.⁴

Our immediate concern is with the intimacy which presently sprang up between the Spartan king and Xenophon. The two men were mutually drawn to one another. Xenophon, already,

¹ Hell. III. ii. 21-31; iii., and iv. 1. This method of arrangement is significant of a new departure in the style of writing history. In his earlier work he had naturally followed (more or less consistently) the Thucydidean method of chronicling events by summers and winters.

² See Xenophon's description of "the great Phoenician" in the Economist (viii. 11). The history of the matter is to be found in some fragments of Ctesias preserved by Photius; and in Diodorus. See Grote, H. G. ix. 354 note; and p. xxxvii., supra, for the persons concerned in planning the alliance between Athens and the king.

³ See his allusion to the Cyreians, Hell. III. iv. 2.

⁴ And may be read in the pages of Xenophon and Plutarch.

as I believe, in exile (or, if the other view be right, still free to return to Athens), was fascinated by so vigorous a personality.¹ The new-comer was not only a Heracleid, a king descended from the loins of kings, but there was that about him which prognosticated the right prince. Perhaps Xenophon admired him the more because of the infirmity of his body, seeing that he had an eager and heroic soul within. As a practical man he fully sympathised with the quest upon which he was sent out. He had long ago discovered how easily the Persian empire might be invaded, and by strategic methods sapped. He had pondered over the problems of its dissolution and absorption. On the other hand, Agesilaus could not but appreciate highly the Athenian—whether or not he had already incurred banishment as an over-zealous admirer of Spartan institutions. With his combined literary and philosophic tastes, his military training and experience, his local knowledge of the country and the character of the Persians and their subject nations, he was exactly the man to keep by his side if possible as his political adviser. Before many months had passed the intimacy was sealed, and from this date onwards (396 B.C.), or a little later, we must think of Xenophon not perhaps in command of the Cyreians so much as attached to the staff of the general-in-chief. Cicero speaks of him as the instructor and inspirer of Agesilaus.² In his own more technical phrase he figures, if I mistake not, among the ἐπικαίριοι of the Spartan king. He is one of “those about him,” and the two became fast friends.

Perhaps at this date one of the minor services rendered by Xenophon to his patron was to help in organising the cavalry.³ Whether that particular function devolved on him personally may be doubted ; but to his keen interest in the undertaking and sympathy with the spirit of emulation fostered by the 'archie' man for training regiments of infantry and squadrons of cavalry, and one arm against another arm, we have ample testimony in those pages of the Hellenica which concern the present moment. Certain chapters are all aglow with organisation conducted on the competitive principle, and, as I must once more remind my readers, these passages will repeat themselves, sometimes phrase for phrase, in parallel pages of the Cyropaedia. If the separation from his country, and the fading hopes of attaining glory at Athens, and the loss of familiar scenes and faces were a source of deep regret to him, as doubtless was the case,¹ there were certain consolations here. "Patria, bonis, amicis, genitoribus abero"; but then he had his wife and children, as we imagine, to visit during leisure. He had many dissolving views of scenery, cities of men and actors upon life's daily stage, to interest him artistically. There was the excitement of military preparation, there were chance expeditions to whet the soul and nerve the body—and the business of soldiering was relieved by sport.

¹ E.g. as shown in his setting down of Lysander, Hell. III. iv. Agesilaus, even more than the younger Cyrus, is the prototype in Xenophon's imagination of the “right prince”—Cyrus of the Cyropaedia. Cf. Sidney's An Apologie for Poetrie, 1595—“So right a prince as Xenophon's Cyrus” (p. 25).

² Cic. de Or. III. xxxiv. Curtius says that he took the place of Lysander when the latter was disgraced. See H. G. (Eng. tr., iv. p. 213), bk. v. ch. iii. That he was no longer in immediate command of the Cyreians, if indeed he had ever held that post officially since March 399 B.C., is proved by the statement in Hell. III. iv. 20.

³ See Hell. III. iv. 14; and for his interest in this branch of the service see Hipparch. ix. 9; Cyrop. IV. iii. 4 foll. and passim.

It is impossible in this sketch to follow the story of Xenophon's life as minutely as he has given it—since there is scarcely a page of his history for at least ten years which does not reveal some one or other of his experiences or reflections. Indeed, so far as reflections are concerned, the remark applies to the whole of the Hellenica, and, as I have before said, to most of his writings, the autobiographic transparency of which is extraordinary and leaves no doubt on our minds as to the essential underlying qualities of the writer's nature : his patient courage, his healthy human-heartedness, his painstaking carefulness, his noble ambition, and his reverential piety.²

It was an early experience of Persian warfare in 396 B.C. which had revealed to Agesilaus the need of cavalry.³ He

¹ The terms in which he speaks of exile as one of the great admitted misfortunes of life, seem to show it ; and from the man's friendly nature we must needs divine it.

² καρτερία, φιλάνθρωπία, ἐπιμέλεια, φιλοτιμία, εὐσέβεια. These are the Xenophontine virtues.

³ In Phrygia, where the Greek cavalry were repulsed by the Persian horse of Pharnabazus near Dascylium, Hell. III. iv. 13. The prior events may spent the winter therefore in organising that arm. In the spring of the next year (395 B.C.) he collected his whole army at Ephesus, which, in the glowing language of the historian, became a colossal workshop of war.¹

At the beginning of the official year Lysander and his Thirty were replaced by Herippidas and his Thirty. One of these officers, named Xenocles, with another unnamed officer,² was put in command of the cavalry; another of them, Scythes, commanded the neodamode hoplites; Herippidas himself the Cyreians (which was apparently a corps d'élite); and a fourth of them, Migdon, the contingents from the states. The king warned them (and his voice is the voice of the elder be briefly summarised thus: Leaving Aulis, Agesilaus sailed to Geraestus, where he collected his forces (thirty Spartans, two thousand neodamodes, and six thousand allies), and thence to Ephesus. Tissaphernes at once demanded why he had come, and was told, to secure the full autonomy of the Greek Asiatic cities. The satrap proposed a truce in order to consult the king, but, with his wonted treachery, took occasion instead to send to the king for a large addition to his forces; Agesilaus conscientiously adhered to the treaty. In this interval occurred the humiliation of Lysander, who was sent to the Hellespont, and did good service by persuading Spithridates (see Anab. VI. v. 7, p. 186, for this officer) to revolt from Pharnabazus. Tissaphernes, now reinforced, declared war, unless Agesilaus chose to withdraw from Asia. To this ultimatum Agesilaus replied with a cheerful countenance, μάλα φαιδρῶ τῷ προσώπῳ (compare the description of Clearchus in the Anabasis), bidding the envoys to take back his thanks to Tissaphernes for having so secured the hostility of heaven by his perjury, ὅτι ἐπιорκήσας αὐτὸς μὲν πολεμίους τοὺς θεοὺς ἐκτήσατο τοῖς δ' Ἕλλησι συμμάχους ἐποίησεν, and deceiving Tissaphernes by a skilful ruse, marched not upon Caria but into Phrygia.

¹ Xenophon's description glows with enthusiasm. The passage is quoted by Polybius (xii. 20, 7) and others. ἀξίαν δὲ καὶ δλην τὴν πόλιν, ἐν ᾗ ἦν, θέας ἐποίησεν· ἥ τε γὰρ ἀγορὰ ἦν μεστὴ παντοοαπῶν καὶ ἵππων καὶ ὀπλῶν ὧν ὡς οἱ τε χαλκοτύποι καὶ οἱ τέκτονες καὶ οἱ χαλκεῖς καὶ οἱ σκυτοτόμοι καὶ οἱ ζωγράφοι πάντες πολεμικὰ ὄπλα κατεσκεύαζον, ὥστε τὴν πόλιν ὄντως οἶεσθαι πολέμου ἐργαστήριον εἶναι. ἐπερρώσθη δ' ἂν τις καὶ ἐκεῖνο ἰδὼν, Ἀγησίλαον μὲν πρῶτον, ἔπειτα δὲ καὶ τοὺς ἄλλους στρατιώτας ἐστεφανωμένοις ἀπὸ τῶν γυμνασίων ἀπιδοντας καὶ ἀνατιθέντας τοὺς στεφάνους τῇ Ἀρτέμιδι. ὅπου γὰρ ἄνδρες θεοὺς μὲν σέβοντο, τὰ δὲ πολεμικὰ ἀσκοῖεν, πειθαρχεῖν δὲ μελετῶν, πῶς οὐκ εἰκὸς ἐνταῦθα πάντα μεστὰ ἐλπίδων ἀγαθῶν εἶναι; Hell. III. iv. 16-19. See Xen. Works, II. p. 29 for a translation of the passage.

² τούτων Ξενοκλέα μὲν καὶ ἄλλον ἔταξεν ἐπὶ τοὺς ἵππεῖς, Σκύθην δὲ ἐπὶ τοὺς νεοδαμῶδεις ὀπλίτας, Ἡρίππιδαν δ' ἐπὶ τοὺς Κυρεῖους, Μίγδωνα δὲ ἐπὶ τοὺς ἀπὸ τῶν πόλεων στρατιώτας, καὶ προεῖπεν αὐτοῖς, ὥς εὐθὺς ἡγήσοιτο τὴν συντομωτάτην ἐπὶ τὰ κράτιστα τῆς χώρας, ὅπως αὐτόθεν οὕτω τὰ σώματα καὶ τὴν γνώμην παρασκευάζοντο ὡς ἀγωνιούμενοι. Hell. III. iv. 20. Who is meant by ἄλλον? If he was one of the Thirty, why is he not named with the other four officers? Is it possibly Xenophon himself?

Cyrus in Xenophon's romance) of his intention to march through the roughest districts of the country, in order to whet their souls and bodies against the day of battle, which was not long. And this he did, marching upon Sardis. He met the enemy on the Pactolus, and defeated him. Part of the spoil was some camels, which, the historian tells us, Agesilaus imported into Greece.¹ Tissaphernes was in Sardis when the battle took place, and there he met his fate. Accused at Susa of mismanaging affairs, he was superseded by another satrap, Tithraustes, who was sent down with orders to behead him; and so he died. The new satrap had new terms to offer to the Spartan king. Agesilaus on his side would do nothing without sanction from the home authorities; but having got thirty talents from Tithraustes to support his army, he gave him respite, and retired north into the territory of Pharnabazus.

Tithraustes meanwhile, who had grave suspicions that the Spartan had no intention of leaving Asia, but, on the contrary, was cherishing vast hopes of capturing the King himself, resorted to other tactics.

It was now that the Rhodian Timocrates was sent with fifty talents of silver to visit the states of Greece, and so to work upon their leaders as to kindle the flame of war against Lacedaemon. The Rhodian with his thirty thousand 'archers'² visited Thebes, Corinth, and Argos, not without success. The Athenians, though they would have no share of the gold, were equally eager for the war; νομίζοντες αὐτῶν τὸ ἄρχειν "empire belonged to themselves"—that was their creed. It was thus that the coalition of the allies was cemented, and now that everything was ready, the Thebans, according to the historian,³ set the springs of hostility in motion. The disposition to war they found already existing; a pretext only was wanting, and this they easily devised. It was to set the Locrians of Opus and the Phocians by the ears. Presently the Thebans found themselves in the position of champions defending the Locrians, and Sparta the Phocians. Either state was really anxious to fly at the other's throat. The Laconians had not forgotten how the Thebans had claimed a tithe of the spoil dedicated to Apollo in the Deceleian war ; nor, yet again, how they had not only refused to join in the expedition against Piræus (in B.C. 403), but had induced the Corinthians to refuse also ; nor, last of all, their late affront to King Agesilaus at Aulis. Indeed they thought the moment opportune, and rushed hastily into war, sending Lysander into Phocis. Here that officer was to raise forces and march upon Haliartus, where Pausanias, the Spartan king, was to join him with the Peloponnesian forces by a certain day. Lysander carried out his commission to the letter. He went farther : he brought over Orchomenus. Pausanias the while was collecting his forces at Tegea.

¹ See Grote, H. G. ix. 432; and for the use of camels in battle, Cyrop. VII. i. 22, 28, 48; Pollux, i. 140.

² "The coin of Persia is stamped with the figure of an archer," Plut. Ages. (Clough, iv. 19).

³ So Thirlwall (vol. iv. p. 391) after Xenophon, Hell. III. Cf. Grote, ix. 397-408, and Curtius, bk. v. iv. (vol. iv. 221-224, Eng. trans.) for their views of the Phocian war.

The Thebans, finding that they were to be invaded by a Laconian army, sent an embassy to Athens. Their speech does great credit to the envoys and to Xenophon's historic imagination.¹ It was a delicate matter for a Theban to address the ecclesia at Athens. There were many ancient prejudices to be overcome and painful recollections to be effaced. The orator begins with the most poignant of these : the attitude of Thebes at the end of the great war, when they had proposed to wipe Athens off the face of Hellas. But that was not the vote of a free constitutional city, it was the wicked design of a single man ; whereas on a later and happier occasion, when they had refused to march upon Piræus, the whole city passed that resolution. It was their conduct then which had brought down upon them the wrath of Sparta now. He presses the claim of obligation home on the city party and on the Democracy in turn. He kindles their imaginations by appeals to the well-known ambition of the city to recover empire.

"When we and you are standing shield and shield together (συνασπιδούντες), be sure the enemies of Sparta will spring up by thousands on every side. Laconians are hated everywhere—by Argos of old, by Elis in modern times.

¹ Hell. III. v. 8-15. "The speech of the Theban envoys sets forth strikingly the case against Sparta as it then stood," Grote, H. G. ix. 405.

SKETCH OF THE

Corinthians, Arcadians, and Achaeans, one and all, like ourselves, detest them for good reasons. We are tired of fighting their battles and receiving no share of the reward of toil. They appoint their helots¹ as harmosts, and now in the day of their success belord it over their allies, who are after all free men. No set of people have suffered more than your own subject allies, who clutched at liberty and have embraced a twofold slavery. They lie between the upper and the nether millstone of the harmost and Lysander's Decarchy. And what of the great king who contributed the heaviest item towards your overthrow? With him it fares to-day no better than if he had supplied Athens instead of Sparta with the sinews of war. Now then is your opportunity. Put yourself at the head of all these victims of Spartan injustice, and you will regain your empire. You will more than regain it. Athens will be the mistress not of a maritime force only as of yore, but of all of us. We, and the Peloponnesians, and your former subjects, and the king himself with his vast armament, will follow your leadership. We were staunch allies to Sparta in the past. How much more staunch shall we be to Athens now when we are fighting, not for islanders, or Syracusans, or other foreigners, as in the late war, but for ourselves who have suffered foul wrong! Your empire crumbled; how much more readily will this fabric of selfishness called Sparta fall to pieces! Your empire was based on a naval power, which they lack. Theirs is a system of selfish dominance, the tyranny of a handful of people exercised over numbers equally well armed. Now is your time, men of Athens. We summon you to a fortune far happier for Athens even than for Thebes." The assembly unanimously voted the alliance, and that too in spite of the fact pointed out by Thrasybulus to the envoys, that Athens lay midway between the belligerents with dismantled walls.² But they had not forgotten the debt of gratitude due to Thebes during the troubles of the Thirty. They would run the risk.

Into the history of this campaign I need not enter. Lysander was slain at Haliartus; Pausanias arrived too late,

¹ Compare with this indictment Xenophon's own strictures on the degeneracy of Sparta in the appendix chapter to his Lacedaemonian Polity, xiv.

² Hell. III. v. 16.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

It was not all play, however, for the satrap, ousted from house and home, was ever ready to pounce upon marauding parties, or gave occasion himself for some deed of emprise. Scene upon scene, these incidents of the campaign present themselves. It is like turning over the leaves of an artist's note-book ; or, more truly, these are finished sketches illustrative of the matter in hand, which will by and by themselves be turned to new account as the material of more elaborate compositions. And what a ripple of sunny gladness plays over these leaves ! what joy in mere living they reveal ! what a merry-go-round of soldierly adventure ! what an absolute freedom from ennui ! what contrasts ! The gipsy life of the roving Persian satrap ; the brilliant raid of Herippidas ; the sudden departure in dudgeon of Spithridates and his Paphlagonians.¹ The crowning scene is an interview between Agesilaus and the satrap.² It was arranged by a certain Cyzicene Greek named Apollophanes, an old friend of the satrap's and a new friend of the king's. The trysting-place was a grassy mead, where Agesilaus and his Thirty lay outstretched on the sward awaiting the arrival of Pharnabazus, who appeared ere long in magnificent golden apparel. His courtiers and attendants began to lay down carpets and cushions for their lord. But the satrap was too well bred to indulge in displays of luxury as if in contrast with Spartan simplicity. He too, without more ado, reclined upon the greensward. The interview is dramatically conducted in the historian's favourite manner. It is also a chapter in political diplomacy. The language used by Pharnabazus brought a blush to the cheeks of those over-aggressive Spartans. It is impossible not Wolves. Eagles, of more than one species, were constantly in sight. Vultures are occasionally met with, and the red-legged partridge, quail, and woodcock are abundant." The whole description of the hunting-grounds, parks, and open country has its parallel in the Cyropaedia. It was here, too, as well as on the field of Cunaxa, that Xenophon made the study of Scythian chariots (§ 7), which he elaborated into the monograph on the subject in Cyrop. VI. i. 52 foll.

¹ To complete the story—these barbarians could not understand the regulations of the Spartan quartermaster-general touching spoil. So off they went to throw in their lot with Ariaeus, who had also, it seems, revolted from the king. Hell. IV. i. 26 foll.

² Ib. IV. i. 29-38. Apollophanes is another of the "go-betweens." See above.

to admire the courteous independence of the Persian. Our sympathies are touched. Like Agesilaus, we are ready to grasp the satrap's hand and assure him of our warmest regard. Surely Xenophon was seated there amongst the Thirty, if not of them. To the more serious business there is a pretty after-scene—the seal of reconciliation between king and satrap.¹

It was about the beginning of spring in the year 394 B.C. when, in accordance with his promise to Pharnabazus, the Spartan king withdrew from Phrygia. Reaching Thebe's plain, he encamped in the neighbourhood of the temple of Artemis of Astyra, and began collecting a numerous host from all sides. His preparations were made with a view to marching up as far as possible into the heart of the Persian dominions, and in the progress of this march he reckoned on being able to detach one nation after another from the king.

What hold such a project must exercise on the minds of those concerned, and on Xenophon in particular, we can well imagine. Some years later,² when the hegemony of Sparta was scarcely more widely admitted than at this season, the democratic orator Lysias urged at Olympia the duty of pan-Hellenic combination against the tyrant of the west, Dionysius, and the tyrant of the east, Artaxerxes. At a later Olympic festival Isocrates in his Panegyrikos still more elaborately argued in favour of an attack on Persia, which ancient wrongs and present opportunity alike demanded. "If for Hellas' sake our fathers rallied against Troy, ought not an insult to ¹ See Grote, H. G. ix. 387. All these internunciatory stories reveal a side of Greek character (I scarcely like to think of Xenophon's own character, and yet he has a touch of it) which I hardly know how to name. I fear the word "flunkeyism" must be uttered. In us, at any rate, the thing I am aware of would amount to flunkeyism; and in the Alexandrian period there is no doubt about it. There is flunkeyism ad nauseam there. Xenophon and his friends are saved by the grace and obvious dignity of the narrative. They do not sacrifice their own liberty of action; but whether for artistic purposes or because he feels the glamour of orientalism, he surrounds his archie man (be it Agesilaus or Cyrus the Great) with too many scraping courtiers and nodding satellites, in too oriental a fashion, ὥς γε ἐμολ δόκει. See Cyrop. passim.

² Either 384 B.C., as Grote (H. G. x. 103 note) and others think, or in the preceding Olympiad, 388 B.C., which is Sir R. Jebb's view. See his reasons for accepting this as the date of the Olympiakos of Lysias (Attic Orators, i. 204 note 2). The date of Isocrates' Panegyrikos is undoubtedly 380 B.C., I think; op. cit. vol. ii. ch. xvi. p. 150 fol. I have freely availed myself of Sir R. Jebb's analysis of both speeches.

Hellas to kindle a war now—a war which will move forward, not liable to repulse, but with the stately progress of a sacred embassy?" This was in 380 B.C. Fourteen years previously Agesilaus was looking forward to a march moving forward not liable to repulse; and he had good reasons for so prognosticating. He chanced also to have with him the best authority on such a matter in the person of Xenophon himself, who could tell him in plain terms (what the Olympic orator did not fail to introduce as the climax of his argument), the inherent weakness of Persia. "Some stand in awe of his strength. Were he indeed strong that would be but another reason for attacking him before he is stronger. But he is not strong." Xenophon might have anticipated the very language of the orator. "I pass over the successes against Persia of Dercylidas, of Dracon, of Thibron, of yourself Agesilaus. Nor is the mettle of the Persian troops better than the quality of Persian generalship. This was well seen in our own case who accompanied Cyrus. After the loss of our leaders, surrounded by difficulties of every kind, we effected our retreat as smoothly as if the Persian force, which sought to harass it, had been a guard of honour. Chastised when he invaded Europe, defeated on the seaboard of Asia, the Persian king has actually been mocked under the walls of his own palaces."¹ To the Greeks the practicability of the idea was now for the first time demonstrated. Its fascination needs no demonstration to ourselves. To attack the Barbarian was incumbent as a sacred duty, not only because he was the natural and common foe of Hellas, but for the unifying of the states of Hellas. So it appeared as an unselfish project which appealed directly to men's consciences, and might at times be preached as a crusade.² Sooner or later it must be realised; but the glory of its fulfilment was denied to Agesilaus,³ and to him who was partly the inventor of it—Xenophon.⁴

¹ See Anab. II. iv. 4. p. 51.

² The parallel is so far tenable, in that the crusades were directed against the common foe of Christendom and tended to the unification of the nations of Europe.

³ Denied also to Jason of Pheræ and to Philip, its realisation was, as all the world knows, reserved for Alexander. See Bacon's Works, iii. 313 (Spedding and Ellis).

⁴ See Plut. Ages. (Clough), iv. 10, 21, 23, 35, 40, for Xenophon's relation to the Spartan king.

Just when the march was about to be commenced, Epi-cydidas arrived from Sparta with the message of recall.
Xenophon admires the Spartan discipline with which the king turned and obeyed. He is sorry for him. But in some respects he was himself the more to be pitied. Once more the chance of doing something which should redound to his honour was stolen from him. There was in his case also a deeper calamity attending the change of programme. To follow Agesilaus homewards, in whatever capacity he went, was a double disaster. It was to run more than the ordinary risk of life, which was perhaps of little consequence;¹ and it involved, further, his appearance in the field of battle in opposition to his own countrymen.

If, as I suppose, he was already banished, possibly he had but little choice of action. All we know about the matter is from his own lips in a single passage.² It is not even plain, though an obvious inference from that passage, that he was present at Coronea. Plutarch (and it is only what any one else would be inclined to do) somewhat expands the remark, "Xenophon, who was present and fought on Agesilaus' side, reports it to be the hardest fought battle that he had seen."
Xenophon's own description of the battle, it must be added, reads like that of an eye-witness, and for compressed force of language is a masterpiece of word painting often quoted by the ancient writers.³

But the fact of his presence is one thing, the moral question another. In reference to this double problem I have little to say, except that I believe he was present, and not improbably in arms. He may have been in command of a division of cavalry, or he may have been simply attached to

¹ We may fairly credit Xenophon, who was not so much philo-Laconian as a man cast in Dorian mould, with the desire to live and die ὡς κάλλιστα (see Anab. passim). According to the epitaph of Plut. Pelop. (Clough), ii.
p. 202—

" They died, but not as lavish of their blood,
Or thinking death itself was simply good ;
Their wishes neither were to live nor die,
But to do both alike commendably."

² Anab. V. iii. 6, p. 140, compared with Plut. Ages. (Clough), iv. p. 21.

³ Hell. IV. iii. 15 foll., especially § 19. Cf. Longinus, περὶ ὁψους, § 19.
Xenophon himself repeats it in Cyrus. VIII. i. 38.

the staff of the general and performing the duty of an adjutant. In either case had he been taken prisoner it would have gone hard with him. Wherever he was, he was a keen observer of the fighting ; but he unfortunately does not mention as an eye-witness or from hearsay what part his own countrymen played. He merely tells us that they were posted in front of Herippidas and the foreign brigade, including, I suppose, the Cyreians. It is significant that he entered into private life soon after, unless perhaps for a few years he continued to attend Agesilaus on some of his campaigns. It is further noticeable that no word of reproach in reference to his conduct on that day is raised against him by any ancient writer, contemporary or other ; nor does any word drop from his lips in sign of an evil conscience. Yet it is he who has said some of the noblest things ever said touching the duty of a citizen to the state. Nor do I think that his share in the wider if more visionary sentiment of pan-Hellenic patriotism can be urged in explanation of his conduct, since, though doubtless he was strongly swayed by it, he was not of so dull a wit that he could fail to distinguish between one duty and another. Nor again was he, nor could he feel himself to be, justified as an exile fighting for reinstatement, or for the subversion of a pernicious government, de facto but not de jure dominant at home. He was not in the position of a follower of Hippias at Marathon, or of the Duke of Berwick at the Boyne, or of a French émigré noble in '93. He could not possibly excuse himself by casuistical arguments suited to the later circumstances of mercenary generalship. The difficulty in which he was involved was not the result of a private connexion by marriage with a Seuthes or a Cotys. He was not in like case with some free-lance captain who, on a sudden turn of politics, should find himself in the employment of his country's enemy, the other day its friend.¹ The difficulty in

¹ The story of Charidemus would be illustrative were his not an exceptional case amongst the condottieri of those times. That of Iphicrates, taking part with his father-in-law Cotys and actually fighting against Athens, is more apt. See Demos. c. Aristocr. p. 664, § 153. ἐτόλμησεν ὑπὲρ τῶν Κότυος πραγμάτων ἐνάντια τοῖς ὑμετέροις στρατηγοῖς ναυμαχεῖν. Grote, H. G. x. 410 ; Curt. H. G. v. 103, Eng. trans. ; Rehdantz, l'it. Iphic. Chabr. Timoth. Athenien-sium, v. §§ 7, 8.

Xenophon's case was in some sort exceptional, and the explanation of his behaviour obvious. In no case was his offence so heinous but that before the end of his days the sentence of exile was rescinded. This only happened indeed when the "Boeotian" party at Athens had lost and the "Laconian" party had regained its power. At that date (possibly in 369 B.C.) Xenophon was not only reinstated legally, but was evidently regarded by his fellow-citizens as one whom they could well afford to be proud of. But concerning this matter, not more obscure indeed than it was unhappy, enough has been said. The reader will form his own conclusion.¹

Agesilaus was wounded in the battle of Coronea, and taken home to Sparta. Thither Xenophon evidently, as I think, accompanied him, and with him there stayed for the next few years (between 394 B.C. and 389 B.C., or even so late as 387 B.C., the year of the peace of Antalcidas). He probably accompanied Agesilaus on more than one campaign in this interval. He seems to have been with him during the expedition into Corinth² (392 or 391 B.C.?), and at Peiraeum, when the news of the destruction of the mora by Iphicrates was brought. Possibly he was with him also the following year in Acarnania. There is the same minuteness of detail and vividness of description now and again in his chronicle of these years, which we have noted as a proof of the historian's presence at the scene of action in Asia.³

The two incidents of chief biographical importance for ¹ If he takes Grote's view he will probably subscribe to the verdict of Niebuhr, "Xenophon was not a good citizen," albeit in other respects καλλιστὸς τε καὶ ἀριστος. For myself, I regard him as to some extent (how far it is impossible to say) a victim of circumstances. I also admit that the web in which he was eventually caught was very much of his own weaving. Facilis descensus: the fault was greatest when the act was slightest. He ought never to have joined Cyrus, the enemy of his country, on a wild-goose chase after glory. But how, being what he was, could he at that date have resisted the temptation? and how could any one, except perhaps Socrates, have foreseen the mischief which would come of it? The remark in the Memorabilia comes back to us: "But those who refused to listen to his warning lived to repent of their obstinacy." It is not the fashion of these Greeks to speak of personal joys and sorrows. He had too much κατὰ πρᾶτα to bemoan his misfortune.

² Hell. IV. iv. 19; IV. v. 2; IV. vi. 6 foll.

³ See above, p. xl. foll.

this whole period are now to be named. The first of these has indeed been already discussed in detail in a former footnote—the latter has been more than once referred to. It was during his sojourn at Sparta, as Plutarch tells us, that at the instance of Agesilaus the exiled philosopher was persuaded to send for his children, and had them educated in the lore of Spartan chivalry. That is the first point. The second is that at a certain date—perhaps before, and probably not later than, 387 B.C.—he was sent as a colonist to Scillus by the Laconians, in appreciation of his services, and eventually presented with a house and farm.¹ Scillus was one of the Triphylian townships which had been taken from Elis in 400 B.C., where the donors evidently wished to have some trusty person with a head upon his shoulders, to represent their interests. No doubt, in return for the gifts of leisure and security the new resident was expected to play the part of proxenos or consul to the Spartans. In both of these opportunities so presented to him the philosopher is to be deemed happy. The first enabled him to bring up his children in what he probably regarded as the best education to be had in Hellas; the other to write his books.²

It was doubtless at Sparta that he collected facts and formed reflections, the fruit of which is to be found not only in the Lacedaemonian Polity (an immediate product of his sojourn in the capital), but in those other political studies, the Hiero and the Cyropaedia. His mind was set working more definitely than before on the question of government (what is an ἀρχή?), and these are his answers. The Hiero probably did not find expression until the author had witnessed the remarkable scene

¹ See Diog. Laert. Life of Xen. § 8. ἐντεῦθεν ἦλθεν εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα μετὰ Ἀγησιλάου κεκλημένου εἰς τὸν πρὸς Θηβαίους πόλεμον· καὶ αὐτῷ προξενίαν ἔδωσαν οἱ Λακεδαιμόνιοι· ἐντεῦθεν, ἑάσας τὸν Ἀγησίλαον ἦχεν εἰς Σκιλλοῦντα . . . ἀφικομένου δὲ τοῦ Μεγαβύζου κατὰ πρόφασιν τῆς πανηγύρεως, κομισάμενος τὰ χρήματα χωρίον ἐπρίατο καὶ καθιέρωσε τῇ Θεῷ . . . φησι δ' ὁ Δείναρχος ὅτι καὶ οἰκίαν καὶ ἀγρὸν αὐτῷ ἔδωσαν Λακεδαιμόνιοι. Cf. Paus. v. 6, 5. Λακεδαιμόνιοι δὲ ὕστερον Σκιλλοῦντα ἀποτεμόμενοι τῆς Ἠλείας Ξενοφῶντι ἔδωσαν τῷ Γρύλλου κ.τ.λ.

² See Plutarch, de Exilio, p. 603 B. ποία φυγαδικὴ νῆσος οὐκ ἔστι πλατυτέρα τῆς Σκιλλουντίας χώρας, ἐν ᾗ Ξενοφῶν μετὰ τὴν στρατείαν τὸ λιπαρὸν εἶδε γῆρας; ib. p. 605 C. Θουκυδίδης συνέγραψε τὸν πόλεμον τῶν Πελοποννησίων καὶ Ἀθηναίων ἐν Θόρῃ περὶ τὴν Σκαπτὴν ὕλην· Ξενοφῶν ἐν Σκιλλοῦντι τῆς Ἠλείας.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

unscathed. But this is to anticipate the evil day, which was also the day of glory and renown, by many years. Before they left Sparta the boys were probably of an age to play football and to go hunting excursions with the other young Spartans;¹ and we may guess, from their appellation, these great twin brethren were quite at home, and favourites. Their father is silent of course concerning his own domestic life and literary occupations.² Of the latter I have already spoken. The former we are left to gather from the many passages in which he lovingly depicts the joys and sorrows, the sunshine and April showers, of boyhood,³ and the sophrosyne (σωφροσύνη) of womanhood. He might well have written a special treatise on boyhood—a prose poem, in that sweet style of his own, anticipative of l'art d'être grand-père. He did write, as is well known, a treatise which might have been entitled On Wifedom—the Economist, which Alberti⁴ (or some other of those times) used to depict the life of a good citizen, founded on masserizia, piety, and good sense. Perhaps we need not go farther to assure ourselves of Xenophon's own private happiness than to this idyll of married life, the delicate domesticity⁵ of which is truly touching. This was a peace which no exile could rob him of, and which was

¹ See Müller's Dorians, vol. ii. p. 309. "During the progress from the condition of an ephebus to manhood, the young Spartans were called Sphaereis, probably because their chief exercise was football, which game was carried on with great emulation, and indeed resembled a battle rather than a diversion. In their nineteenth year they were sent out on the crypteia," etc. The two boys would be brought up as τρόφιμοι.

² If not finished some years ago, the first part of the Hellenica (Bks. I. and II. to speak roughly—see Xen. Works, I. p. lviii., Note C) perhaps belongs to this date, and was finished in Sparta.

³ Cyrop. passim. For l'art d'être grand-père, see Cyrop. I. iv., Astyages and his little grandson. One cannot help thinking of Xenophon and his two sons, whilst reading the passages on brotherly affection in the Memorabilia, II. iii. 1 foll., and Cyrop. VIII. vii. 13 foll. As to the sophrosyne of woman, see Cyrop. passim. Heywood has put two of these—Panthea, the wife of Abradatas, and Tigranes's wife—into his Γυναικεῖον (pp. 126, 245 of the edition of 1624). There are many others, historical or purely imaginary, sketched in a manner worthy of Euripides or of the painter Zeuxis himself.

⁴ Alberti wrote also in exile. See for the influence of Xenophon's Oeconomicus on Italian writers, Mr. Symonds, Italian Lit. Part I. p. 196 note.

⁵ Cf. Cyrop. VII. v. 56 for the secret of Xenophon's happiness—"Home, sweet Home"—and the keystone of his philosophy.

independent of locality. He could find it alike in Europe and in Asia : Sparta, Scillus, Corinth in turn fostered it. It was, as far as any earthly joy may be, perdurable.

If indeed anything of a more external character were needed to enhance it, that additional element was to be found in the quietude of Scillus.¹ The lovely scenery of the place itself, to this day lovely ; the delicious atmosphere ; the rare combination of mountain, wood, and stream ; the opportunity for sport ; the horses and the dogs ;² the farmstead and its daily round of occupations ; the household and its inmates, with their varied interests ; the neighbouring townships and local politics ; the proximity to Olympia ; the recurring season of festival ; the stream of visitors ; the pleasures of hospitable entertainment ; the daily family sacrifices at the hearth or before the cedar image of the great goddess Artemis in her model temple—these things, and, above all, the serene satisfaction of literary labour, combined to form an enviable sum total of sober happiness during many years.

MIDDLE AGE, 387 (or 389)-371 B.C. circa ; AT SCILLUS ; INTELLECTUAL FLORUIT, GREAT LITERARY PERIOD.

It is not certain at what date the family migrated to Scillus, nor at what precise date was disestablished ; but ¹ See map ; also Baedeker's Greece, p. 315, and Xenophon's own description, p. 140 of this volume. It is appropriate here to quote the words of Themistius "the eloquent" [flor. 355 A.D.] That writer, like Cicero and the ancients in general, fully believed in the genuineness of the Agesilaus (as to which I will state my views in a later volume). He says (Or. 2, p. 27 D) 'Αγησίλαον δὲ οἶδα τὸν βασιλέα τῆς Σπάρτης ὅτι Ξενοφῶν οὐκ ὤκνει ἐπαινεῖν καὶ ἀμείβεσθαι μακρῷ βιβλίῳ (or does the orator refer to Hellenica B. rather than the ἐγκώμιον itself?) ἐπειδὴ αὐτῷ νέμεσθαι διεπράξατο χωρίον τι μεταξὺ Ἡλίδος καὶ Ἀρκαδίας, οὐ πόρρω Σκιλλοῦντος ἐν τῇ φυγῇ. —Οὐ μὲν οὐδὲ ἡ χάρις ὁμοία ἀγρῶν ἐργάζεσθαι προῖκα Ἀρκαδικόν, ἢ ἐπαινοῦ τυχεῖν ἀγῆρω τε καὶ ἀθανάτου· τάχα δ' ἂν καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ Ἀρχιδάμου τιμιώτερον ξυνέφη εἶναι τῆς αὐτοῦ δωρεᾶς τὸ χαριστηρίον τοῦ Ξενοφώντος· τὸ μὲν γὰρ λόγος ἦν ὑπὸ φιλοσόφου γεγραμμένος, ἡ δέ, εἴ τι δεῖ προσέχειν τῷ εἰληφότι, πυροὶ καὶ κριθαὶ καὶ τρωκτὰ ὠραῖα καὶ δορκάδας καὶ σὺς διώκειν τε καὶ ἀκοντίζειν.

² For the horses and dogs, see Xenophon's two tracts, that on Hunting (Cyngeticus), perhaps a youthful work ; and that on Horsemanship, a work of his old age. Pollux the grammarian (v. 47) says he had a dog named Hippocentaur—cf. Cyrop. IV. iii. 17 ; Aelian V. H. 9. 39. For the farming occupations, see the Economist. See Xen. Works, III. part i. and part ii.

there, amid those loveliest surroundings of nature, and within easy reach of the sacred city, they lived, we must assume, for fifteen or probably twenty years. There the boys grew up to manhood, properly trained for war by yearly hunting expeditions. There let us believe that Philesia, being still alive, played a part like that of the wife of Ischomachus,¹ finding happiness in manifold co-operation with her husband; the wife, the mother, the kindly mistress of the house, befriending her servants, and beloved of all.² There, at all events, the father, whose character was fully formed, spent his time between healthy bodily and mental exercises, "in hunting," as his biographer has told us,³ "and entertaining his friends, and writing his histories." Here certainly he attained his literary prime.⁴

A large number of his writings (at least as finished compositions) probably date from this period. Others were in process of composition, and had reached various stages of completion, before Xenophon was forced to change his residence. Both sets may appropriately be named in order here. They are the specially Socratic writings, including the Memorabilia, the Economist, and the Symposium, which are all closely connected—the Economist being, as I have elsewhere suggested (Xen. Works, vol. i. p. liv.), an expanded chapter of the Memorabilia but, as a finished composition, perhaps the earliest of the three. With these, as a product of the Scilluntine leisure, we must include the Hiero, the nature and occasion of which admirable dialogue have already been noticed. It is worth noting perhaps, as a point of biographic interest, that the proximity to Olympia enabled Xenophon to keep in some sort of touch with the world of letters. He may well have listened to the very speech of Lysias above referred to, and, at a later date, to the Panegyric of Isocrates. These oppor-

¹ "She is to be like the queen bee in her hive," ἡ ἐν τῷ σμῆρει ἡγεμὼν μέλιττα (poetry anticipating science in this pretty illustration), Oecon. vii. 17.

² Ib. vii. 37; cf. Eurip. Alc. 192 foll.; Browning, Balaustion's Adventure, p. 38.

³ τοῦντεῦθεν διετελεῖ κινήγετων καὶ τοὺς φίλους ἐστιῶν καὶ τὰς ἱστορίας συγγράφων, Diog. Laert. Life of Xenophon, § 9.

⁴ He must, if born about 431 B.C., have been between forty and fifty when he came, and about sixty when he left.

tunities were not likely to be wasted. The last writing, which almost certainly belongs in the same sense to this period, is the Polity of the Lacedaemonians (see Xen. Works, II.).

This list of finished, and possibly published, works does not, as already stated, exhaust the literary labours of the period. During the sixteen or eighteen years in question (from 389 or 387 B.C. to 371 B.C.) the author, it would seem, had two or three of his larger works still on hand, though at various stages of completion. Thus the Anabasis, if for the greater part written, was not published in its final form till after 371 B.C., or even later.¹ The second part of the Hellenica,² containing a record of Hellenic affairs from the year 403 B.C. to 387 B.C., was in the same way probably ripe for publication before Xenophon left Scillus; while whatever his method of composition may have been, the author was certainly employed in collecting notes for the final portion of the same historical work³ during the whole of his residence in Scillus. Besides which we may suppose that he was always in some sense working at and meditating scenes and chapters for his historico-philosophical romance, the Cyropaedia. Possibly he had made some advance with the composition as a whole. The publication (or completion), however, of these four larger, and of his remaining minor works⁴ can be clearly referred to a later period, when his happy residence at Scillus was a bygone.

If we are right in our conclusions, that residence was discontinued in the year so disastrous to the arms of Sparta on the field of Leuctra (B.C. 371), and for reasons closely connected with that historical event.

¹ As proved by internal evidence deducible from Anab. V. iii. p. 140 foll. See Xen. Works, I. Note B. p. lxvi.

² Hellenica B=Bk. III. i. 1 (or perhaps more strictly, II. iii. 11) to V. i. 36.

³ Hellenica C=Bk. V. ii. to the end of Bk. VII. (387 B.C.-362 B.C.) The process of collecting notes for this Work at Sellus, broken off in 371 B.C., was resumed at Corinth, and occupied the author till the end. The book was still on hand in 359 B.C. See Xen. Works, I. pp. lvii., lxii., lxiii.

⁴ The Cynegeticus was possibly already published; the Lac. Pol. probably at Scillus. The remaining minor works are the Hipparchikos, and the tract on Horsemanship, the Agésilas, and the pamphlet on Revenues. I do not count the Apology, which some hold to be spurious. See Xen. Works, II., III.

Into the minutiae of this question I need not here enter, but will reserve its discussion for a footnote. I agree with most modern critics in accepting 371 B.C.¹ as most probably ¹ This is Roquette's view (de Xen. Vit. i. § 6, . 26 foll.), with which Grote (H. G. ix. 245, 246) evidently agrees (though in his Plato, iii. 567, he seems to have altered his view). I cannot do better than quote his words. "The interesting description which he himself (Xenophon) gives of his residence at Skillus implies a state of things not present and continuing, but past and finished. Other testimonies, too, though confused and contradictory, seem to show that the Laconian settlement at Skillus lasted no longer than the power of Lacedaemon was adequate to maintain it. During the misfortunes which befell that city after the battle of Leuctra (i.e. 371 B.C.), Xenophon, with his family and his fellow-settlers, was expelled by the Eleians, and is then said to have found shelter at Corinth." This date is at any rate much nearer the mark than 363-362 B.C., which, unless it is a mere slip of the pen, would seem to be Grote's later view, as expressed in his Life of Xenophon, above referred to. "Skillus," he there says, "the place in which the Lacedaemonians had established Xenophon, was retaken by the Eleians during the humiliation of Lacedaemonian power, not long before the battle of Mantinea" (i.e. 362 B.C.) Nor again do I follow Curtius (vol. v. Eng. tr. p. 149; bk. vii. ch. ii.) when he says, "The war between Arcadia and Elis" (referring to the war of 365 B.C. apparently) "once more deprived him of a home; he emigrated to Elis, but about the same time," etc.

The fullest argument for the date 371 B.C. is given in Roquette's dissertation, de Xenophontis Vita. He assigns two main reasons for that particular date:—

(1) The Eleians, at the congress, held in the autumn of that year at Athens just after the battle of Leuctra, to which the Athenians invited all who wished to hold to the Peace of Antalcidas, claim that certain cities of the Triphylla (Marganes and the rest, of which they had been robbed in 400 B.C.) should not be regarded as independent (Hell. VI. v. 2, in reference to Hell. III. ii. 20), which claim (according to Roquette) implies that they were then recovered.

(2) This recovery could only have taken place when the Laconians were somehow crippled, as they were at the instant of the defeat at Leuctra.

Roquette finds confirmation of his view in the following facts. (1) The hostility of Elis to Sparta is a fait accompli in the winter of 370-369 B.C.—i.e. they are allies of the Thebans on the first Theban invasion of Peloponnese (Hell. VI. v. 30; Grote, H. G. x. 294). (2) In 368 B.C. the Eleians maintained that these cities had deserted to the Arcadians (Hell. VII. i. 26), which implies that between 400 B.C. and 368 B.C. they had for a season recovered them. (3) Diog. Laertius's (i.e. Dinarchus's) phrase, βραδυρόντων Λακεδαιμονίων, implying some slackness on the part of Lacedaemon, would be inapplicable after 370 B.C., when Megalopolis was built, and still more so in 369 B.C., when Messenia also was freed; since, however rapid had been their movements at the latter date, the Lacedaemonians could hardly have relieved the towns in question, being themselves cut off from both the northern roads to the Triphylla.

With this reasoning in the main I agree. I do not think, however, that it follows from the claims put forward by the Eleians at the Athens congress of 371 B.C. that they had necessarily at that time recovered the townships, since the claim was clearly irrespective of any uti possidetis, or their then condi-

the date of the occurrence, the history of which I will now state in the words of the most ancient authorities. This is what Dinarchus the orator tells us in the pages of Xenophon's biographer, Diogenes Laertius. "The Eleians marched against Scillus, and through the tardiness of the Laconians (in relieving it) took the place; at which time his sons made their escape by stealth, with a few of the domestics, to Lepreum (a township farther south in the Triphylia); and Xenophon himself, first to Elis (?),¹ and then to Lepreum, where he joined his sons; and from Lepreum eventually escaped along with them to Corinth, and there settled."²

Xenophon is silent in his history of the times about this, as also about much else of larger historical importance. Whether or not he betook himself to Elis³ (city or district), or for what reason, now or at any subsequent moment, is beyond tion. It was anterior. Perhaps they had already recovered them: perhaps they only succeeded in their object later. By 368 B.C. apparently they had again lost them.

¹ εἰς τὴν Ἡλῶν πρότερον. This is puzzling. Why should he at such a crisis betake himself to Elis? One would like to substitute Τλην, if only one could find authority for such a name or district. "Forest," or "Woodlands"; but see below.

² Diog. Laert. § 9 of Life.

³ According to Pausanias, v. 6, 6.

The Eleian exegetae told the traveller, when he visited the spot five centuries afterwards, that Xenophon had been condemned in the judicial council of Olympia, as being a wrongful occupant of the property at Scillus obtained through Laconian violence; but that the Eleians had granted him indulgence and allowed him to remain. He adds that a short distance from the temple a monument was pointed out, with a statue in Pentelic marble on the tomb, which the inhabitants believed to be of Xenophon. His words are: οἱ δὲ Ἡλείων ἐξηγηταὶ κομίσασθαι τε αὐτοῖς Σκιλλοῦντα Ἡλείους ἔλεγον, καὶ Ξενοφῶντα, ὅτι ἔλαβε παρὰ Λακεδαιμονίων τὴν γῆν, κριθῆναι μὲν ἐν τῇ Ὀλυμπικῇ βουλῇ, τυχόντα δὲ παρὰ Ἡλείων συγγνώμης ἀδεῶς ἐν Σκιλλοῦντι οἰκῆσαι. Καὶ δὴ καὶ ὀλίγον ἀπωτέρω τοῦ ἱεροῦ μνημῆα τι ἐδείκνυτο καὶ τῆς Πεντελῆσις ἐστὶ λιθοτομίας εἰκὼν ἐπὶ τῷ τάφῳ· εἶναι δὲ αὐτὸ Ξενοφῶντος λέγουσιν οἱ προσοικοῦντες. But probably Grote is right in his criticism of this story: "As it seems clearly asserted that Xenophon died at Corinth, he can hardly have availed himself of the indulgence; and I incline to suspect that the statement is an invention of subsequent Eleian Exegetae, after they had learnt to appreciate his literary eminence" (Grote, Plato, iii. p. 568). Or is it possible that there is some truth in the story—that the case was heard and sentence passed, followed by a special indulgence, for whatever reason, granted to the pious intruding foreigner: which indulgence he for many reasons may not have cared to avail himself of? The story in any case is interesting as a tradition.

our discovery. To Corinth clearly he eventually came, and there he once more established himself.

Corinth then we assume to be the scene of Xenophon's last years. At Corinth we must suppose he finished his literary labours. At Corinth, according to the statement of another ancient authority, "he finished his course." But there were many years to run yet before the last lap of the race was reached.

AT CORINTH, 371-354 B.C. circa; RECALL, AND SEAVICE OF HIS SONS IN THE ATHENIAN CAVALRY, 369 B.C.; DEATH OF GRYLLUS, 362 B.C.; LITERARY LABOURS, 359 B.C. and onwards; OLD AGE AND FINAL WORK, 355 B.C.; DEATH, 354 B.C. circa.

THE years which remain appear to have flowed in general with an even tenor. They are the years of ingathering. One is aware of certain autumnal tints, and an occasional flutter as of sere leaves falling, but they were rich with the fruitage of ripe thought and literary labour. It is of that we think rather than of the two or three external incidents which fall within the period. These latter, however momentous as personal experiences, are devoid of complexity, and may be briefly chronicled. The most important of them are the recall of Xenophon from banishment, the mission of his sons to Athens, and the death of Gryllus.

If we are right in our dates and suppositions, Xenophon was past sixty when he found a new home for himself and his family at Corinth. His wife was, we hope, still living; no one knows. His sons would be young men of about eight or nine and twenty. They had perhaps already seen service,¹ oppor-

¹ See the passage, Hell. V. iii. 9. in which the historian describes the campaign undertaken after the defeat and death of Teleutias before Olynthus in 381-380 B.C. The authorities despatched the king, and with him, as in the case of Agesilaus' Asiatic campaign (see above, p. xlvii.), thirty Spartans τριάκοντα Σπαρτιατῶν· πολλοὶ δὲ αὐτῷ καὶ τῶν περιόκων ἐθέλονται καλοὶ καὶ ἀγαθοὶ ἠκολούθουν καὶ ξένοι τῶν τροφίμων καλουμένων καὶ νόθοι τῶν Σπαρτιατῶν μάλα εὐειδεῖς τε καὶ τῶν ἐν τῇ πόλει καλῶν οὐκ ἄπειροι. Grote (H. G. x. 91) conjectures that Xenophon's two sons, being educated at Sparta, would come under the category of τροφίμοι, and if either were old enough, he might probably have been among the volunteers to accompany Agesipolis. At this date Gryllus may have been about eighteen, and of an age to serve. For the noble carriage of these young men and their high

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

while the Athenians having passed a decree to aid the Lacedaemonians, Xenophon sent his sons to Athens to serve in behalf of the Lacedaemonians," adding, in a later passage, that according to the historian Ister, the decrees of Xenophon's banishment and recall were due to the same person, whose name was Eubulus. What is of greater importance to us regarding the matter biographically, is that after so many years of change and counterchange in the domestic and foreign politics of the city, and of her political parties, the moment had at last come in which Xenophon, in the persons of his sons, and by the labour of his pen, might find himself once more functioning like a true-born Athenian, powerful at once in speech and action (λέγειν τε καὶ πράττειν δυνατώτατος).

Such a happy conjunction of the stars was reached in 369 B.C.; happy it was, at any rate, for Xenophon, as he scanned the political horizon, and waited for a sign in Corinth. We can easily follow the sequence of events, as we turn over the pages of his own history: the cold shudder which ran through the Athenian senate, seated in the Acropolis, at receipt of the news of Leuctra¹ (B.C. 371); the reawakening ambition of the leaders of the Democracy to strike out a more independent policy; the thought of hegemony; the retreat of the Spartan reinforcements; the intercession of Jason;² the summons to a congress at Athens of all who cared to hold to the Peace of Antalcidas; the dissentient Eleians contesting the autonomy of such townships as Marganes and Scillus and the Triphylia;³ the rebuilding of the walls of Mantinea, and the recovery of her civic life in spite of Agesilaus; the pan-Arcadian movement, and the split of parties at Tegea; the rival programmes of her dêmos and her optimates; the party of Callibius driving out the party of Stasippus; the intervention on the one side and the other of Mantinea and Sparta; the cohesions and disruptions of the Arcadian League; the elective affinities of the different states of Peloponnese;

¹ Hell. VI. iv. 20, τῶν δὲ Ἀθηναίων ἡ βουλή ἐτίγχανεν ἐν ἀκροπόλει καθημένη, κ.τ.λ.

² Ib. ib. 20-24. Note Jason's Xenophontine argument, καὶ ὁ θεὸς δέ, ὡς εἶκε, πολλάκις χαίρει τοὺς μὲν μικροὺς μεγάλους ποιῶν, τοὺς δὲ μεγάλους μικροὺς, and see below, Αναβ. III. ii. 10, p. 76.

³ Ib. v. 1-3, for the congress at Athens, and the dissent of the Eleians.

the fierce party politics; Arcadian Orchomenus refusing to join the League in hatred of Mantinea; the Argives biding their time; the abortive attempt to try conclusions with Mantinea on the part of Agesilaus during the mid-winter of 370 B.C.;¹ the fateful spring of 369; the Thebans joining the Arcadians, and with them a cloud of northern powers—the Phocians and the Eubaeans, the Locrians and the Acarnanians, the Heracleotes and the Malians, with horse and light infantry from Thessaly,—their objective Laconia; the burning of Sellasia; the enemy encamped near the unwalled city of Sparta itself; the women of Sparta and the sons of Sparta at bay; the hideous nightmare dissolving as the Theban army passed on to Amyclae and across the Eurotas away to Helos and Gytheum; the Spartans offering and dreading to arm their helots; a new horror; the four faithful allies—the men of Phlius, the men of Corinth, the men of Epidaurus and Pellene;² the restoration meanwhile of Messene,³ the autonomy of which ancient state, now suddenly revived, will become the keystone of the pan-Boeotian policy of the great Theban statesmen ere long; and so we are brought to the moment when, as we picture to ourselves, there was a break in the storm-clouds overhead, through which a ray of joyous sunlight shed itself on the veteran historian, seated in his study at Corinth, and waiting for a sign.

It is no part of my intention at present to attempt to estimate the political position of Xenophon either as a citizen or as a historian of the time. To do so would lead us too far afield, and involve us in the discussion of deeper matters concerning the literary and philosophical standpoint of our author, which may fitly be postponed for future consideration.⁴

¹ Hell. VI. v. 3-21, for the incidents in Peloponnese till the Winter of 370 B.C.

² Ib. ib. 22-32, for the incidents of the first Theban invasion in 369 B.C.

³ Xenophon omits to mention the founding of pan-Arcadian Megalopolis and the restoration of Messene at the moment, but refers to both later on. Hell. VII. v. 5; and VII. i. 27, 36.

⁴ I hope in a final volume to offer a few remarks on Xenophon's literary quality and position in the evolution of thought and feeling—in a word, his spiritual quality. But such observations clearly should stand as the epilogue rather than as the prologue to the piece. In his Hellenica we are at once brought face to face with the problem of Xenophon's position as one

If, however, we wish to discover certain political leanings of Xenophon at this particular period of his life, we cannot do better than study the sentiments which he puts into the mouth of the Athenian orator Callistratus (the head of the anti-Theban or "Laconising" party at Athens between the years 378 B.C. and 361 B.C.) when sent with Callias and Autocles to Sparta before the battle of Leuctra in 371 B.C.;¹ or again, of the Phliasian envoy Procles in his address to the Athenian ecclesia in 370 B.C.² It was that speaker's eloquence which carried away the feelings of the Assembly, so that the arguments of the opposition fell on deaf ears, and the resolution was passed to aid Sparta with a levy en masse; and for this object Iphicrates was chosen general, 369 B.C. If it was a satisfaction to Xenophon to send his sons back to Athens at such a crisis, the conduct of the campaign was not altogether to his taste as a military critic. The blunder of Iphicrates—since, in spite of his great ability as a general, he seems to have committed a blunder in the handling of his cavalry—made a deep impression on Xenophon, and served him for illustration in his

of the Attic historians. As to which I commend to the notice of my readers Mr. Freeman's essay, "The Historians of Athens," Historical Essays, 2nd series. For my own views, see Xen. Works, II. Introduction, p. xvii. foll.

¹ For 371 B.C., see Hell. VI. iii. 10-17. Callistratus's is the third speech, and is skilfully juxtaposed so as to form a climax to the bracing home-truths of Autocles and the professional platitudes of the Dadouchos Callias. Callistratus admits that Athens and Sparta have both made grave blunders as imperial and rival states. But sweet are the uses of adversity. One need not continue rivalry to the bitter end. It is possible to take the pitcher once too often to the Well, ἀλλὰ μὴν οὐδ' ἐκείνους ἐγώ γε ἐπαινῶ οἵτινες ἀγωνιστὰι γινόμενοι καὶ νενικηκότες ἤδη πολλάκις καὶ δόξαν ἔχοντες οὕτως φιλονεικοῦσιν, ὥστε οὐ πρότερον παύσονται πρὶν ἢ ἡττηθέντες τὴν ἀσκήσιν καταλύσωσιν, οὐδέ γε τῶν κυβευτῶν οἵτινες αὐτὰν ἐὰν ἐν τι ἐπιτύχωσι περὶ διπλασίῳ κυβεύουσιν. ὁρῶ γάρ καὶ τῶν τοιούτων τοὺς πλείους ἀπόρους παντάπασι γιγνομένους. The athlete may descend once too often into the arena. The gambler may go on doubling the stakes till he finds himself penniless, ἀ χρὴ καὶ ἡμᾶς ὁρῶντας εἰς μὲν τοιοῦτον ἀγῶνα μηδέποτε καταστήναι, ὥστ' ἢ πάντα λαβεῖν ἢ πάντ' ἀποβαλεῖν, ἕως δὲ καὶ ἐρρώμεθα καὶ εὐτυχοῦμεν φίλους ἀλλήλοις γενέσθαι. Let us pause in time and shake hands, before our stock of strength is spent, and our luck exhausted. So shall we through you, and you through us, attain to an unprecedented height of power throughout Hellas, οὕτω γὰρ ἡμεῖς τ' ἂν δι' ὑμᾶς καὶ ὑμεῖς δι' ἡμᾶς ἔτι μείζους ἢ τὸν παρελθόντα χρόνον ἐν τῇ Ἑλλάδι ἀναστρεφόμεθα.

² For 370 B.C., see Hell. VI. v. 38-48, ἐπὶ δὲ τούτῳ (Cleiteles of Corinth) ἀνέστη Προκλῆς Φλιάσιος καὶ εἶπεν. "Ὅ τι μὲν, ὦ ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι, κ.τ.λ.

pamphlet on the cavalry general's duty so often referred to.¹ This is how he speaks of it.

The professed object of Iphicrates was to cut off the retreat of Epaminondas and the Thebans returning homewards in the winter of 369 B.C. This, intentionally or not, he failed to do. The historian was well posted in Corinth to watch the tactics of both parties. As the enemy withdrew from Lacedaemon Iphicrates fell back with his Athenians on Corinth. (He lays his finger sharply on the Athenian general's next move.) Whilst watching on Oneion to intercept the enemy's retreat, he allowed him free exit by the magnificent side route of Cenchreae; and then in his desire to discover whether the Thebans had passed Oneion, he must needs send the whole of his Athenian and Corinthian cavalry in force on scouting duty, when a handful of troopers would have served the purpose of a reconnaissance quite as well as the larger body. In case of need they would have had a far better chance of hitting upon a suitable road and falling back leisurely. It was the height of folly to advance a force at once so large and yet inferior to the enemy. It was inevitable, owing to the extent of ground they covered, that they should be involved in all sorts of difficulties, and the result was the needless sacrifice of twenty troopers. The Thebans meanwhile were past and gone, and no one said them nay. With this criticism should be compared an admonitory note addressed to the cavalry general² some four years later. Probably both passages were penned about the same time, and serve amongst many others to show the undiminished interest which the old cavalry officer continued to feel in his favourite branch of the service.¹

¹ See Hell. VI. v. 51, 52, εἰ μὲν οὖν ἄλλο τι καλῶς ἐστρατήγησεν, οὐ ψέγω· ἐκεῖνα μὲντοι, ἃ ἐν τῷ χρόνῳ ἐκείνῳ ἔπραξε, πάντα εὐρίσκω τὰ μὲν μάτην, τὰ δὲ καὶ ἀσυμφόρως πεπραγμένα αὐτῷ· ἐπιχειρήσας μὲν γὰρ φυλάττειν ἐπὶ τῷ Ὀνεῖω, κ.τ.λ. For English rendering see Xen. Works, II. p. 185; III. part ii. p. 28 foll.

² Hipparch. viii. 10 foll. ἔτι δὲ βούλομαι ὑπομνήσαι καὶ τόδε φυλάττεσθαι· εἰσὶ γὰρ τινες, οἳ ὅταν μὲν ἴωσιν ἐπὶ τούτους, ὧν ἂν οἴωνται κρείττους εἶναι, παντάπασιν ἀσθενεῖ δυνάμει ἔρχονται, ὥστε πολλάκις ἔπαθον ἃ ὤντο ποιήσειν· ὅταν δ' ἐπὶ τούτους ὧν ἂν σαφῶς ἐπίστωνται ἥττους ὄντες, πᾶσαν ὅσην ἂν ἔχωσι δύναμιν ἀγούσιν. ἐγὼ δὲ φημι χρῆναι τάναντία τούτων ποιεῖν, ὅταν μὲν κρατήσῃν οἴμενος ἄγῃ, μὴ φείδεσθαι τῆς δυνάμεως, ὅσην ἂν ἔχη· τὸ γὰρ πολὺ νικᾶν οὐδενὶ πώποτε μεταμέλειαν παρέσχεν. ὅταν δὲ τοῖς πολὺ κρείττοσιν ἐπιχειρῇ καὶ προγιγνώσκῃ, ὅτι ποιήσαντα ὅτι ἂν δύνῃται φευκτέον ἐστίν, εἰς τὰ τοιαῦτά φημι πολὺ κρεῖττον εἶναι ὀλίγους ἢ πάντας προσάγειν, τοὺς μὲντοι ἀπειλεγμένους καὶ ἵππους καὶ ἄνδρας τοὺς κρατίστους· τοιοῦτοι γὰρ ὄντες καὶ ποιῆσαι ἂν τι καὶ ὑποχωρῆσαι ἀσφαλέστερον ἂν δύναιτο. ὅταν δὲ πρὸς τοὺς κρείττους πάντας προσαγαγὼν ἀποχωρεῖν βούληται, ἀνάγκη τοὺς μὲν ἐπὶ τῶν βραδυτάτων ἵππων ἀλλοσκεσθαι, τοὺς δὲ καὶ δι' ἀφιππείαν πίπτειν, τοὺς δὲ καὶ διὰ δυσχωρίας

That the sons of Xenophon were present on the above occasion is, of course, not absolutely certain; but, if the biographer is to be relied upon, they probably were. They may also have shared in one or more of those exploits which their father recounts in his list of the valorous deeds of the men of Phlius—as, for instance, when their knights and a picked body of hoplites, aided by a squadron of Athenian cavalry, repelled an attack of the Arcadians and Argives “at the passage of the river” (ἐπὶ τῇ διαβάσει τοῦ ποταμοῦ) apparently in 368 or 367 B.C.,² or again under the Athenian general Chares. The admiration of the historian for this little state, the neighbour and ally of Corinth, is highly characteristic, and the manner in which he introduces the story of her prowess as an episode worthy of record is remarkable. Historians,³ he tells us, are ever prone to expatiate upon the great deeds of the great powers, whereas it seems to him a higher duty to bring to light a long list of valorous achievements wrought by some single petty state. There were features physical and historical peculiar to this particular little state of Phlius which tended to rivet his attention to it—its proximity to Corinth, its steadfast loyalty to the Laconian alliance at ἀπολαμβάνεσθαι· καὶ γὰρ πολὺν τόπον χαλεπὸν εὐρεῖν ὅσον ἂν τις εὔξειτο, κ.τ.λ. For other criticisms of Iphicrates of a more laudatory character, see Hell. IV. viii. 36 foll.; VI. ii. 32; ib. 39.

¹ See especially Hippiarch. ix. for various reforms which he proposes to introduce into the state cavalry as to the admixture of a foreign element—e.g. eight hundred citizens and two hundred foreigners at Athens—and his illustration from Laconian reforms (since Leuctra, when their cavalry was wretched, Hell. VI. iv. 11); also as to the introduction of ἄμυπποι, light infantry, among the cavalry, Hippiarch. v. 13; and an improvement in the arm. He would like to introduce τὰ κρανείνα δύο παλτά, after the fashion of the Persians, instead of the long δόρυ καμάκινον; Horsemanship, xii. 12; cf. Cyrus. VII. i. 2, and Hell. III. iv. 14, a personal experience. See above, p. xlvi.

² See Hell. VII. ii. 10, and ib. 20, in connection with the Athenian general Chares.

³ ib. ib. 1, ὁμῶς δὲ διεκαρτέρου ἐν τῇ συμμαχίᾳ. ἀλλὰ γὰρ τῶν μὲν μεγάλων πόλεων εἴ τι καλὸν ἐπραξαν, ἅπαντες οἱ συγγραφεῖς μέμνηνται· ἐμοὶ δὲ δοκεῖ καὶ εἴ τις μικρὰ πόλις οὔσα πολλὰ καὶ καλὰ ἔργα διαπέπρακται, ἔτι μᾶλλον ἄξιον εἶναι ἀποφαίνειν.

the present crisis, the chivalry of its citizens, their bravery, generosity, and religiousness. But even so, there is a warmth of tone in the chronicle of their doughty deeds which seems to point to some close personal relationship. There is no proof of this; yet, as we recollect, the old family soothsayer, Eucleides,¹ came from Phlius.

In the year 366 B.C. incidents occurred² which make it intelligible to us why Xenophon, even if free to return to take up his abode permanently in Athens or the neighbourhood of Athens, may well have chosen to continue his residence in Corinth. The fact is that from this date onwards, and for many years, Corinth was much the quietest place for a student and non-combatant to live in; and at this period of life, if ever, Xenophon had his hands full of literary work of all sorts. His practical energies were satisfied, as already suggested, by the composition in behalf of his native city of those political tracts which I have used so freely for the purpose of biographic illustration. I believe that he never migrated from his home in Corinth, and for the reason suggested; but it is more than likely that he was often in Athens, the glitter of whose temples was visible from the lofty Acropolis of Corinth, and whose streets and squares were dear to him.³ Perhaps he was there for weeks at a time, or months, or even years, but "stranger-loving Corinth," as the biographer's epigram has it, had received him in the day of need, and to her fostering arms he clung. Here a student of history and politics might gaze at the shifting scenes of the complicated drama now enacting without being called upon to play a part himself. The various vicissitudes of states and parties would proceed, but the philosopher would not himself be caught into the vortex of political life. Governments would rise and fall; the great man might become, like Jason,⁴ greater and most

¹ See above, pp. iv., xxvii., and below, p. 247.

² See Hell. VII. iv. 6-11, and note 2, next page; and cf. for the situation of the moment Isoer. Archidamos; Jebb. Att. Or. ii. 193.

³ See Revenues, i. 4. for the architectural beauty of the city, κάλλιστοι μὲν ναοί, κάλλιστοι δὲ βωμοί . . . εὐπρεπέστατα δὲ Θεοῖς ἀγάλματα, and Hipparch. ch. iii. for topographical details in connection with the Panathenaic procession and other πομπαί. There is a strong flavour of Attic life in such passages. The local colouring, at any rate, is vivid and very pleasing.

⁴ See, for Jason's rise and fall, especially Hell. VI. iv. 27-32; and for the great, and at the height of his power fall by the knife of an assassin, but the working out of the divine purpose would only be clearer to his religious consciousness. Demagogues like Euphron or Lycomedes might flourish for a season and be swept to their doom, his heart might be touched, but the hand of the artist would not falter in its portraiture; the chronicler of tragic incidents would depict and criticise and point his morals, as the spirit moved him, with reserve and dignity. He might be tempted to throw down his pen in despair at the confusion worse confounded which seemed the sole result of the battlefield of Mantinea,¹ but the wave of its storm would not come nigh him. He could still console himself with his great philosophical romance and his minor scientific treatises.

It was as the result of a series of such political vicissitudes² artifice of style, μέγας μείζων μέγιστος, cf. Hell. VI. v. 47. καλὸν κάλλιον κάλλιστον.

¹ See the concluding words of the Hellenica, VII. v. 27, "Where it was expected that one or other of these fell combatants would rule an empire, there set in once more confusion worse confounded (not an ἀρχή, but worse anarchy)," and my remarks in the volume of essays already referred to, "Hellenica," p. 383 (p. 350 2d ed.)

² Hell. VII. i. 39 foll. (1) The state congress at Thebes had proved a failure. None of the powers could be got to sign a rescript obtained from the king at Susa the year before (Hell. VII. i. 33 foll.), securing a common peace on the basis of the autonomy of Messene and the nullification of the navy of Athens. (2) The Thebans had their hands full in Thessaly. (3) Whilst the armed force of Athens under Chares was occupied in Argolis, the town of Oropus was snatched from her by refugees from Eretria. Chares was ordered home, but as soon as his back was turned the Arcadians and Thebans recovered the port of Sicyon, which was a severe blow to Athens. None of the allies would help her (Hell. VII. iv. 1). She was forced to put Oropus into the hands of Thebes till the rival claims could be arbitrated upon (Hell. VII. iv. 2). (4) Lycomedes thereupon seized the opportunity of negotiating a peace with the Athenians, indignant at their isolation; and so it came about that at one and the same moment Athens was in league with Sparta and her enemies the Arcadians, whilst the Arcadians themselves were in league with Thebes and her enemies the Athenians. But that was not the end of the matter. (5) On the motion of Demotion it was proposed to append as a rider to the Atheno-Arcadian peace an injunction to the generals to secure Corinth to the Democracy (Hell. VII. iv. 4, 5): εἰπόντος δὲ Δημοκλῆτος ἐν τῷ δήμῳ τῶν Ἀθηναίων ὡς ἡ μὲν πρὸς τοῖς Ἀρκάδας φιλία καλῶς αὐτῷ δυκολίᾳ πράττεσθαι, τοῖς μέντοι στρατηγοῖς προστάξαι ἔφη χρῆναι, ὅπως καὶ Κόρινθος σῶα ἢ τῷ δήμῳ τῶν Ἀθηναίων· ἀκούσαντες δὲ ταῦτα οἱ Κορίνθιοι . . . κ.τ.λ. (6) The Corinthians getting wind of their intention, promptly but in the civilest manner sent away all Athenian troops from their garrisons, and when Chares appeared with his fleet in the harbour of Cenchreae, refused him anchorage (Hell. VII. iv. 5). (7) Then by a stroke of diplomacy they secured the treaty of neutrality

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

hand of Gryllus, as represented in a famous picture.¹ The loss of this young man signifies, of course, but a drop in the cup of collective pain ; nor was the particular pain itself without its anodyne, since the youth had died nobly. There is a pretty fragment of a letter among the Xenophontine epistles preserved in Stobaeus, which no one will hold to be genuine, but the sentiment of it is well conceived, and seems to fall from the lips of Xenophon. It is addressed to Soteira, who may be supposed to be the wife or sister of Gryllus. "Blessed then is Gryllus, blessed amongst those who chose not length of days but a life of virtue ; blessed is he, although God granted to him but a brief span of years" (μακάριος οὖν δὴ Γρύλλος καὶ ὅστις οὐ τὸ μήκιστον ἐλόμενος τοῦ βίου, τὸ δὲ μετὰ ἀρετῆς, καὶ εἰ βραχύν οἱ ἔδωκεν αἰῶνα ὁ Θεός).² This is how Diogenes Laertius recounts the matter. He is inaccurate in details, but the tale itself deserved to live. "Diodorus came safely out of the battle without having wrought any conspicuous deed. He had a son born to him whom he named after his brother. Gryllus was serving in the cavalry ; it was the battle of Mantinea, and he fought valorously and was slain, as says Ephorus in chapter xxv. Cephisodorus was in command of the Attic horse, and Hegesileos was general. It was in this battle that Epaminondas fell.³ Meanwhile, as the story goes, Xenophon was engaged in offering sacrifice ; the chaplet was upon his brow when they brought him news, saying, 'Your son has fallen,' whereupon he removed the chaplet ; but as the messengers added 'nobly' he replaced it on his head, shedding, as others have mentioned, no tear, but only uttering the words ἦδειν θνητὸν γεγεννηκώς, (I knew my child was mortal)."

But of this matter enough. To pass on a few years. The autobiographical passage penned by Xenophon in 359 B.C.⁴

¹ Painted by Euphranor. See Pausan. VIII. xi. 6 ; IX. xv. 5 ; Ephor. ap. D. L. ii. 53 ; Plut. de Glor. Athen. ii. 346. The real slayer, according to Dioscorides ap. Plut. Ages. 35, was the Spartan Anticrates (Machaerion).

² Epp. frag. e Stob. 9.

³ Epaminondas fell in the battle itself, as every one knows. It is doubtless a mistake to suppose that Gryllus fell actually in the same battle. The Athenian cavalry, as we learn from Xenophon himself, scarcely came into action. Nothing at any rate is said of any loss sustained on their part, which, if Gryllus had fallen on that day, would be truly astonishing.

⁴ Hell. VI. iv. 37, τῶν δὲ ταῦτα πράξαντων (the assassins of Alexander of (which has been more than once referred to) brings us back to the writer's study ; and now, if ever, we must picture him hard at work finishing and revising, and perhaps superintending the editing of various works. How these labours were performed, and who helped him in them, we cannot say. Perhaps some member of his family, his son or a grandson, or a favourite slave or freedman, played the part of amanuensis. Perhaps works already on the stocks were now finished ; perhaps later and fuller editions of old works, with notes and emendations and appendices, were now being made ; whilst others were still shaping themselves in his brain or upon his lips. One may almost overhear the author dictating to his secretary, who is taking down the sentences. This is not the place to press the inquiry into his manner of composition further.¹ I content myself with the suggestion conveyed in the above picture. If correct, it might perhaps explain certain puzzles in connection with many of the Xenophontine writings, as we possess them (his repetitions, and so forth), which are familiar enough to the critical student. Perhaps this alter ego, of whom we seem to be aware, is no grandson editor,² nor yet a trader in false wares crudely imitating the writer's mannerism, but simply the voice of the old man himself going over the old ground, and enunciating in season (or, it may be, out of season) wise saws and solemn instances, the inveterate convictions of a lifetime. If the saws are somewhat pedantic at times ;³ if the amiable didactic air has grown Pheræ) ἀχρι οὗ ὅδε ὁ λόγος ἐγράφετο Τισίφονος πρεσβύτατος ὢν τῶν ἀδελφῶν τὴν ἀρχὴν εἶχε. For the date of the occurrence see above, note 3, p. lxiii.

¹ It seems to me certain that, if the Cynegeticus was a Work of his youth (and, doubtless, it is instinct with a certain youthful fervour, as Cobet has said, Mem. 7. 422, N. L. 774, as of one θυμοειδοῦς τε καὶ ἐρωτικοῦ), the author re-handled it in his old age. The Lac. Pol. seems also to have been re-handled ; so too the Memorabilia perhaps, the Cyropaedia, and the Oeconomic.

² See above, in reference to the Oeconomic. It is the opinion of many critics that Xenophon's grandson (the Xenophon of the ἀποστασίου λόγος) perhaps edited his grandfather's Works, and interpolated them. See above. It should be borne in mind that the very existence of this grandson is based upon a mere conjecture, however acute, of Grote (H. G. ix. 246 note 1). It is remarkable what use the critics have made of him. He has proved a very deus ex machina for solving all sorts of bibliographical difficulties.

³ It looks as if Xenophon had in his later years gone to school once more, and taken Isocrates as his model. His style, naturally so simple, appears to upon him ; if he moralises overmuch, we ought not to mind. His heart is still as sound as ever, and his voice was certainly never sweeter than in some of his later works. As I have elsewhere observed,¹ we seem to be listening to a sweet-tongued talker, a wise man and a good, whose style reminds us of the Vicar of Wakefield. In spite of his sage talk, he presents to us the appearance of a practical man, who has seen men and manners, and tasted wisdom at the fountain-head. Nothing is pleasanter than to sit by and listen to his reflections, somewhat loosely and yet pretentiously delivered.

I have already expressed my conviction that the tract on the *Revenues*² is the latest of his works, and that this essay was written, as I take it, to please a friend, but with absolute sincerity, and from the point of view of commercial interests. It was not penned till .355 B.C., when, probably, the writer was over seventy-five years of age, and within a year of his death.

The limits of this sketch do not permit me to dwell on the many points of biographical interest to be discovered in this and the other minor works of Xenophon, replete as these all are with illustrations of the writer's personal qualities—his religiousness and his moralising vein, his belief in the virtue of sport and athleticism, his economic bent,³ his strategic and scientific interests, his kindness to slaves and animals,⁴ his appreciation of the duties of a good father⁵ and a good citizen—his pride in Athens underlying all.⁶

I will content myself with but two instances among many. The first passage is from the Hipparchikos, and was penned, have become, sometimes pleasantly and sometimes painfully, artificial. Apart from which, he has suffered much from editors and interpolators.

¹ See my essay in "Hellenica," pp. 343, 344 (313 foll. 2d ed.)

² As is proved, I think, by internal evidence. Apparently it was intended for a speech, or to be read as a speech, on some financial debate in the Senate at Athens. The friend for whom it was written may have been Eubulus himself, or a supporter of his. For the policy advocated cf. Isocrates, de Pace. If the writer of this tract was not Xenophon himself, it was certainly some one who had thoroughly caught his manner, and thought as he did on most matters.

³ I have already referred to Cyrop. VIII. ii. 5, a passage worthy of Adam Smith.

⁴ See Cyneg. v. 24, 29, 33, passages which remind one of Gilbert White, Michelet, and Charles St. John. ⁵ See Cyneg. i. and xii.

⁶ See Revenues, i. ; v. 10 ; Hipparch. ; de R. Eq. passim.

perhaps, in the year 365 B.C., before his son Gryllus died. The other may be the very last words he wrote before death summoned him also. Both have this biographic quality in common, that the writer relapses into an ancient mood of mind, and, in the second of them, even into an ancient manner of expression. In the former he is apologising for what may seem to his readers the too frequent iteration of his favourite phrase, σὺν Θεῷ (God granting). This is what he says: "If the repetition of the phrase throughout this treatise, 'Act with God,' surprises any one, he may take my word for it, that with the daily or hourly occurrence of perils which must betide him, his wonderment will diminish; as also with the clearer recognition of the fact that in time of war the antagonists are full of designs against each other; but the precise issue of these plots and counterplots is rarely known. To what counsellor, then, can a man apply for advice in his extremity save only to the gods, who know all things, and forewarn whomsoever they will by victims, or by omens, by voice or vision? Is it not rational to suppose that they will prefer to help in their need, not those who merely seek them in time of momentary stress and trouble, but those who, in the halcyon days of their prosperity, make a practice of rendering to heaven the service of heart and soul?"¹

The concluding paragraphs of the Revenues run as follows, and read as if the speaker were recalling an experience of his early manhood: "Yet if none of these proposals be impracticable or even difficult of execution; if rather by giving them effect, we may conciliate further the friendship of Hellas, whilst we strengthen our own administration and increase our fame; if by the same means the People shall be provided with the necessaries of life, and our rich men be relieved of expenditure on war; if with the large surplus to be counted on, we are in a position to conduct our festivals on an even grander scale than heretofore, to restore our temples, to rebuild our forts and docks, and to reinstate in their ancient privileges our priests, our senators, our magistrates, and our knights;—surely it were but reasonable to enter upon this project speedily, so that we too, even in our own day, may witness the unclouded dawn of prosperity in store for our city.

¹ Hipparch. ix. 8, 9; and for the harking back of thought see Mem. and Symp. passim.

“ But if you are agreed to carry out this plan, there is one further counsel which I would urge upon you. Send to Dodona and to Delphi, I would beg you, and consult the will of Heaven : whether such provision and such a policy on our part be truly to the interests of Athens both for the present and for the time to come ? If the consent of Heaven be thus obtained, we ought then, I say, to put a further question : whose special favour among the gods shall we seek to secure with a view to the happier execution of these measures ? And in accordance with that answer, let us offer a sacrifice of happy omen to the deities so named, and commence the work ; since if these transactions be so carried out with the will of God, have we not the right to prognosticate some further advance in the path of political progress for this whole State ? ” ¹

¹ Πόροι, vi. 1-3. This reads like the peroration to a speech addressed to the Boule in a finance debate (see above, p. lxxviii.) ; and for the thought passing through his mind see Mem. and Anab.

ANABASIS

BOOK I. I. 1-5

1.—Darius and Parysatis had two sons : the elder was named Artaxerxes, and the younger Cyrus. Now, as Darius lay sick and felt that the end of life drew near, he wished both his sons to be with him. The elder, as it chanced, was already there, but Cyrus he must needs send for from the province over which he had made him satrap, having appointed him general moreover of all the forces that muster in the plain of the Castolus. Thus Cyrus went up, taking with him Tissaphernes as his friend, and accompanied also by a body of Hellenes, three hundred heavy armed men, under the command of Xenias the Parrhasian.¹

Now when Darius was dead, and Artaxerxes was established in the kingdom, Tissaphernes brought slanderous accusation against Cyrus before his brother, the king, of harbouring designs against him. And Artaxerxes, listening to the words of Tissaphernes, laid hands upon Cyrus, desiring to put him to death ; but his mother made intercession for him, and sent him back again in safety to his province. He then, having so escaped through peril and dishonour, fell to considering, not only how he might avoid ever again being in his brother's power, but how, if possible, he might become king in his stead. Parysatis, his mother, was his first resource ; for she had more love for Cyrus than for Artaxerxes upon his throne. Moreover Cyrus's behaviour towards all who came to him from the king's court was such that, when he sent them away again, they were better friends to himself than to the king his brother; Nor did he neglect the barbarians in his own service; but trained them, at once to be capable as warriors and devoted adherents of himself. Lastly, he began collecting his Hellenic armament, but with the utmost secrecy, so that he might take the king as far as might be at unawares.

¹ Parrhasia, a district or canton in the south-west of Arcadia. For the incidents in the life of Cyrus referred to, see Hell. I. iv. ; II. i. 7-15.

The manner in which he contrived the levying of the troops was as follows: First, he sent orders to the commandants of garrisons in the cities (so held by him), bidding them to get together as large a body of picked Peloponnesian troops as they severally were able, on the plea that Tissaphernes was plotting against their cities; and truly these cities of Ionia had originally belonged to Tissaphernes, being given to him by the king; but at this time, with the exception of Miletus, they had all revolted to Cyrus. In Miletus, Tissaphernes, having become aware of similar designs, had forestalled the conspirators by putting some to death and banishing the remainder. Cyrus, on his side, welcomed these fugitives, and having collected an army, laid siege to Miletus by sea and land, endeavouring to reinstate the exiles; and this gave him another pretext for collecting an armament. At the same time he sent to the king, and claimed, as being the king's brother, that these cities should be given to himself rather than that Tissaphernes should continue to govern them; and in furtherance of this end, the queen, his mother, co-operated with him, so that the king not only failed to see the design against himself, but concluded that Cyrus was spending his money on armaments in order to make war on Tissaphernes. Nor did it pain him greatly to see the two at war together, and the less so because Cyrus was careful to remit the tribute due to the king from the cities which belonged to Tissaphernes.

A third army was being collected for him in the Chersonese, over against Abydos, the origin of which was as follows: There was a Lacedaemonian exile, named Clearchus,¹ with whom Cyrus had become associated. Cyrus admired the man, and made him a present of ten thousand darics.² Clearchus

¹ See above, Hell. I. i. 35.

² = £10,200; a Persian gold coin = 125.55 grains of gold = £1 : 2 : 2½, but see below, pp. 13, 26.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies to Aristippus, to come to terms with those at home, and to despatch to him the troops in his employ; to Xenias the Arcadian, who was acting as general-in-chief of the foreign troops in the cities, to present himself with all the men available, excepting only those who were actually needed to garrison the citadels. He next summoned the troops at present engaged in the siege of Miletus, and called upon the exiles to follow him on his intended expedition, promising them that if he were successful in his object, he would not pause until he had reinstated them in their native city. To this invitation they hearkened gladly; they believed in him; and with their arms they presented themselves at Sardis. So, too, Xenias arrived at Sardis with the contingent from the cities, four thousand hoplites; Proxenus, also, with fifteen hundred hoplites and five hundred light-armed troops; Sophaenetes the Stymphalian, with one thousand hoplites; Socrates the Achaean, with five hundred hoplites; while the Megarian Pasion came with three hundred hoplites and three hundred peltasts.¹ This latter officer, as well as Socrates, belonged to the force engaged against Miletus. These all joined him at Sardis.

But Tissaphernes did not fail to note these proceedings. An equipment so large pointed to something more than an invasion of Pisidia: so he argued; and with what speed he might, he set off to the king, attended by about five hundred horse. The king, on his side, had no sooner heard from Tissaphernes of Cyrus's great armament, than he began to make counter-preparations.

Thus Cyrus, with the troops which I have named, set out from Sardis, and marched on and on through Lydia three stages, making two-and-twenty parasangs,² to the river Maeander. That river is two hundred feet³ broad, and was spanned by a bridge consisting of seven boats. Crossing it, he marched through Phrygia a single stage, of eight parasangs, to Colossae, ¹ "Targeteers" armed with a light shield (πέλτη) instead of the larger dorís of the hoplite, or heavy infantry soldier. Iphicrates made great use of this arm at a later date. See Hell. IV. iv. 16.

² The Persian "farsang" = 30 stades, nearly 1 league, 3½ statute miles, though not of uniform value in all parts of Asia. Cf. Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 19 note (1st ed.)

³ "Two plethra": the plethron = about 101 English feet.

an inhabited city,¹ prosperous and large. Here he remained seven days, and was joined by Menon the Thessalian, who arrived with one thousand hoplites and five hundred peltasts, Dolopes, Aenianes,² and Olynthians. From this place he marched three stages, twenty parasangs in all, to Celaenae, a populous city of Phrygia, large and prosperous. Here Cyrus owned a palace and a large park³ full of wild beasts, which he used to hunt on horseback, whenever he wished to give himself or his horses exercise. Through the midst of the park flows the river Maeander, the sources of which are within the palace buildings, and it flows through the city of Celaenae.⁴ The great king also has a palace in Celaenae, a strong place, on the sources of another river, the Marsyas, at the foot of the acropolis. This river also flows through the city, discharging itself into the Maeander, and is five-and-twenty feet broad. Here is the place where Apollo is said to have flayed Marsyas,⁵ when he had conquered him in the contest of skill. He hung up the skin of the conquered man, in the cavern where the spring wells forth, and hence the name of the river, Marsyas. It was on this site that Xerxes, as tradition tells, built this very palace, as well as the citadel of Celaenae itself, on his retreat from Hellas, after he had lost the famous battle. Here Cyrus remained for thirty days, during which Clearchus the Lacedaemonian arrived with one thousand hoplites and eight hundred Thracian peltasts and two hundred Cretan archers. At the same time, also, came Sosis the Syracusan with three thousand hoplites, and Sophaenetes the Arcadian⁶ with one thousand hoplites; and here Cyrus held a review, and numbered his Hellenes in the park, and found that they amounted in all to eleven thousand hoplites and about two thousand peltasts.⁷

¹ Lit. "inhabited," many of the cities of Asia being then as now deserted, but the suggestion is clearly at times "thickly inhabited," "populous."

² For these tribes see below, p. 168.

³ Lit. "paradise," an oriental word = park or pleasure-ground; in LXX. of the garden of Eden, hence our "Paradise."

⁴ For the position of Celaenae see map.

⁵ For the story of Marsyas see Herod. vii. 26; Livy, xxxviii. 13; Plat. Rep. 3, 399 E.

⁶ Perhaps this should be Agias the Arcadian, as Mr. Macmichael suggests. Sophaenetes has already been named above.

⁷ See Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, ch. xxxiii. p. 289, and below, p. 128, note 4; p. 175, note 3.

From this place he continued his march two stages—ten parasangs—to the populous city of Peltae, where he remained three days; while Xenias, the Arcadian, celebrated the Lycaea¹ with sacrifice, and instituted games. The prizes were headbands of gold; and Cyrus himself was a spectator of the contest. From this place the march was continued two stages—twelve parasangs—to Ceramôn-agora, a populous city, the last on the confines of Mysia. Thence a march of three stages—thirty parasangs—brought him to Caystru-pedion,² a populous city. Here Cyrus halted five days; and the soldiers, whose pay was now more than three months in arrear, came several times to the palace gates demanding their dues; while Cyrus put them off with fine words and expectations, but could not conceal his vexation, for it was not his fashion to stint payment, when he had the means. At this point Epyaxa, the wife of Syennesis, the king of the Cilicians, arrived on a visit to Cyrus; and it was said that Cyrus had received a large gift of money from the queen. At this date, at any rate, Cyrus gave the army four months' pay. The queen was accompanied by a bodyguard of Cilicians and Aspendians; and, if report speaks truly, Cyrus had intimate relations with the queen.

From this place he marched two stages—ten parasangs—to Thymbrium, a populous city. Here, by the side of the road, is the spring of Midas, the king of Phrygia, as it is called, where Midas, as the story goes, caught the satyr by drugging the spring with wine.³ From this place he marched two stages—ten parasangs—to Tyriaeum, a populous city. Here he halted three days; and the Cilician queen, according to the popular account, begged Cyrus to exhibit his armament for her amusement. The latter being only too glad to make such an exhibition, held a review of the Hellenes and barbarians in the plain. He ordered the Hellenes to draw up their lines and post themselves in their customary battle order, each general marshalling his own battalion. Accordingly they drew up four-deep. The right was held by Menon and those with him ; the left by Clearchus and his men ; the centre by the remaining generals with theirs. Cyrus first inspected the barbarians, who marched past in troops of horse and companies of infantry. He then inspected the Hellenes ; driving past them in his chariot, with the queen in her carriage. And they all had brass helmets and purple tunics, and greaves, and their shields uncovered.¹

¹ The Lycaea, an Arcadian festival in honour of Ζεὺς Λυκαῖος, akin to the Roman Lupercalia, which was originally a shepherd festival, the introduction of which the Romans ascribe to the Arcadian Evander. See Plutarch (Caesar).

² Lit. "plain of the Cayster,"-like Ceramon-agora, "the market of the Ceramians" above, the name of a town.

³ For the story of Midas and the Satyr see Ovid, Metam. xi. 90 ff.

After he had driven past the whole body, he drew up his chariot in front of the centre of the battle-line, and sent his interpreter Pigres to the generals of the Hellenes, with orders to present arms and to advance along the whole line. This order was repeated by the generals to their men ; and at the sound of the bugle, with shields forward and spears in rest, they advanced to meet the enemy. The pace quickened, and with a shout the soldiers spontaneously fell into a run, making in the direction of the camp. Great was the panic of the barbarians. The Cilician queen in her carriage turned and fled ; the sutlers in the marketing place left their wares and took to their heels ; and the Hellenes meanwhile came into camp with a roar of laughter. What astounded the queen was the brilliancy and order of the armament ; but Cyrus was pleased to see the terror inspired by the Hellenes in the hearts of the Asiatics.

From this place he marched on three stages—twenty parasangs—to Iconium, the last city of Phrygia, where he remained three days. Thence he marched through Lycaonia five stages—thirty parasangs. This was hostile country, and he gave it over to the Hellenes to pillage. At this point Cyrus sent back the Cilician queen into her own country by the quickest route ; and to escort her he sent the soldiers of Menon, and Menon himself. With the rest of the troops he continued his march through Cappadocia four stages—twenty-five parasangs—to Dana,² a populous city, large and flourishing. Here they halted three days, within which interval Cyrus put to death, on a charge of conspiracy, a Persian nobleman named Megaphernes, a wearer of the royal purple ; and along with him another high dignitary among his subordinate commanders.

¹ I.e. ready for action. Cf. "bayonets fixed."

Or, "Tyana."

From this place they endeavoured to force a passage into Cilicia. Now the entrance was by an exceedingly steep cart-road, impracticable for an army in face of a resisting force ; and report said that Syennesis was on the summit of the pass guarding the approach. Accordingly they halted a day in the plain ; but next day came a messenger informing them that Syennesis had left the pass ; doubtless, after perceiving that Menon's army was already in Cilicia on his own side of the mountains ; and he had further been informed that ships of war, belonging to the Lacedaemonians and to Cyrus himself, with Tamos on board as admiral, were sailing round from Ionia to Cilicia. Whatever the reason might be, Cyrus made his way up into the hills without let or hindrance, and came in sight of the tents where the Cilicians were on guard. From that point he descended gradually into a large and beautiful plain country, well watered, and thickly covered with trees of all sorts and vines. This plain produces sesame plentifully, as also panic and millet and barley and wheat ; and it is shut in on all sides by a steep and lofty wall of mountains from sea to sea. Descending through this plain country, he advanced four stages—twenty-five parasangs—to Tarsus, a large and prosperous city of Cilicia. Here stood the palace of Syennesis, the king of the country ; and through the middle of the city flows a river called the Cydnus, two hundred feet broad. They found that the city had been deserted by its inhabitants, who had betaken themselves, with Syennesis, to a strong place on the hills. All had gone, except the tavern-keepers. The sea-board inhabitants of Soli and Issi also remained. Now Epyaxa, Syennesis's queen, had reached Tarsus five days in advance of Cyrus. During their passage over the mountains into the plain, two companies of Menon's army were lost. Some said they had been cut down by the Cilicians, while engaged on some pillaging affair ; another account was that they had been left behind, and being unable to overtake the main body, or discover the route, had gone astray and perished. However it was, they numbered one hundred hoplites ; and when the rest arrived, being in a fury at the destruction of their fellow-soldiers, they vented their spleen by pillaging the city of Tarsus and the palace to boot. Now when Cyrus had marched into the city, he sent for Syennesis to come to him ; but the latter replied that he had never yet put himself into the hands of any one who was his superior, nor was he willing to accede to the proposal of Cyrus now ; until, in the end, his wife persuaded him, and he accepted pledges of good faith. After this they met, and Syennesis gave Cyrus large sums in aid of his army ; while Cyrus presented him with the customary royal gifts—to wit, a horse with a gold bit, a necklace of gold, a gold bracelet, and a gold scimitar, a Persian dress, and lastly, the exemption of his territory from further pillage, with the privilege of taking back the slaves that had been seized, wherever they might chance to come upon them.

III.—At Tarsus Cyrus and his army halted for twenty days ; the soldiers refusing to advance further, since the suspicion ripened in their minds, that the expedition was in reality directed against the king ; and as they insisted, they had not engaged their services for that object. Clearchus set the example of trying to force his men to continue their march ; but he had no sooner started at the head of his troops than they began to pelt him and his baggage train, and Clearchus had a narrow escape of being stoned to death there and then. Later on, when he perceived that force was useless, he summoned an assembly of his own men ; and for a long while he stood and wept, while the men gazed in silent astonishment. At last he spoke as follows : “ Fellow-soldiers, do not marvel that I am sorely distressed on account of the present troubles. Cyrus has been no ordinary friend to me. When I was in banishment he honoured me in various ways, and made me also a present of ten thousand darics.¹ These I accepted, but not to lay them up for myself for private use ; not to squander them in pleasure, but to expend them on yourselves. And, first of all, I went to war with the Thracians, and with you to aid, I wreaked vengeance on them in behalf of Hellas ; driving them out of the Chersonese, when they wanted to deprive its Hellenic inhabitants of their lands. But as soon as Cyrus summoned me, I took you with me and set out, so that, if my benefactor had any need of me, I might requite him for the good treatment I myself had received at his hands. . . . But since you are not minded to continue the march with me, one of two things is left to me to do : either I must renounce you for the sake of my friendship with Cyrus, or I must go with you at the cost of deceiving him. Whether I am about to do right or not, I cannot say, but I choose yourselves ; and, whatever betide, I mean to share your fate. Never shall it be said of me by any one that, having led Greek troops against the barbarians,¹ I betrayed the Hellenes, and chose the friendship of the barbarian. No ! since you do not choose to obey and follow me, I will follow after you. Whatever betide, I will share your fate. I look upon you as my country, my friends, my allies ; with you I think I shall be honoured, wherever I be ; without you I do not see how I can help a friend or hurt a foe. My decision is taken. Wherever you go, I go also. Be sure of that."

¹ = 10,000 guineas (see p. 13).

Such were his words. But the soldiers, not only his own, but the rest also, when they heard what he said, and how he had scouted the idea of going up to the great king's palace,² expressed their approval ; and more than two thousand men deserted Xenias and Pasion, and took their arms and baggage-train, and came and encamped with Clearchus. But Cyrus, in despair and vexation at this turn of affairs, sent for Clearchus. He refused to come ; but, without the knowledge of the soldiers, sent a message to Cyrus, bidding him keep a good heart, for that all would arrange itself in the right way ; and bade him keep on sending for him, whilst he himself refused to go. After that he got together his own men, with those who had joined him, and of the rest any who chose to come, and spoke as follows : " Fellow soldiers, it is clear that the relations of Cyrus to us are identical with ours to him. We are no longer his soldiers, since we have ceased to follow him ; and he, on his side, is no longer our paymaster. He, however, no doubt considers himself wronged by us ; and though he goes on sending for me, I cannot bring myself to go to him : for two reasons, chiefly from a sense of shame, for I am forced to admit to myself that I have altogether deceived him ; but partly, too, because I am afraid of his seizing me and inflicting a penalty

¹ Lit. "into the country of the barbarian.

² Or, "how he insisted that he was not going up."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

I can render to the man of your choice, that is another matter : and you shall see and know that I can play my part, under command, with the best of you."

After Clearchus another spokesman stood up, and proceeded to point out the simplicity of the speaker, who proposed to ask for vessels, just as if Cyrus were minded to renounce the expedition and sail back again. "And let me further point out," he said, "what a simple-minded notion it is to beg a guide of the very man whose designs we are marring. If we can trust any guide whom Cyrus may vouchsafe to give us, why not order Cyrus at once to occupy the pass in our behoof? For my part, I should think twice before I set foot on any ships that he might give us, for fear lest he should sink them with his men-of-war; and I should equally hesitate to follow any guide of his : he might lead us into some place out of which we should find it impossible to escape. I should much prefer, if I am to return against the will of Cyrus at all, to give him the slip, and so begone : which indeed is impossible. But these schemes are simply nonsensical.¹ My proposal is that a deputation of fit persons, with Clearchus, should go to Cyrus : let them go to Cyrus and ask him : what use he proposes to make of us? and if the business is at all similar to that on which he once before employed a body of foreigners—let us by all means follow : let us show that we are the equals of those who accompanied him on his march up formerly. But if the design should turn out to be of larger import than the former one—involving more toil and more danger—we should ask him, either to give us good reasons for following his lead, or else consent to send us away into a friendly country.² In this way, whether we follow him, we shall do so as friends, and with heart and soul, or whether we go back, we shall do so in security. The answer to this shall be reported to us here, and when we have heard it, we will advise as to our best course."

This resolution was carried, and they chose and sent a deputation with Clearchus, who put to Cyrus the questions which had been agreed upon by the army. Cyrus replied as follows : That he had received news that Abrocomas, an enemy of his, was posted on the Euphrates, twelve stages off; his object was to march against this aforesaid Abrocomas: and if he were still there, he wished to inflict punishment on him, "or if he be fled"¹ (so the reply concluded), "we will there deliberate on the best course." The deputation received the answer and reported it to the soldiers. The suspicion that he was leading them against the king was not dispelled; but it seemed best to follow him. They only demanded an increase of pay, and Cyrus promised to give them half as much again as they had hitherto received,—that is to say, a daric and a half² a month to each man, instead of a daric. Was he really leading them to attack the king? Not even at this moment was any one apprised of the fact, at any rate in any open and public manner.

¹ Or, "all this is mere trifling." ² id. "on friendly terms."

iv.—From this point he marched two stages—ten parasangs—to the river Psarus, which is two hundred feet broad, and from the Psarus he marched a single stage—five parasangs—to the river Pyramus, which is about two hundred yards broad, and from the Pyramus two stages—fifteen parasangs—to Issi, the last city in Cilicia. It lies on the seaboard—a prosperous, large, and flourishing town. Here they halted three days, and here Cyrus was joined by his fleet. There were thirty-five ships from Peloponnesus, with the Lacedaemonian admiral Pythagoras on board. These had been piloted from Ephesus by Tamos the Egyptian, who himself had another fleet of twenty-five ships belonging to Cyrus. These had formed Tamos's blockading squadron at Miletus, when that city sided with Tissaphernes;³ he had also used them in other military services rendered to Cyrus in his operations against that satrap. There was a third officer on board the fleet, the Lacedaemonian Cheirisophus, who had been sent for by Cyrus, and had brought with him seven hundred hoplites, over whom he was to act as general in the service of Cyrus. The fleet lay at anchor opposite Cyrus's tent. Here too another reinforcement presented itself. This was a body of four hundred hoplites,

¹ Reading $\phi\acute{\upsilon}\gamma\eta$; or if $\phi\epsilon\acute{\upsilon}\gamma\eta$, "if he take to flight."

² I.e., roughly speaking, 30s. in lieu of £1; see above, p. 9. The daric "was in value nearly equivalent to a sovereign, and of a very convenient size and shape."—Percy Gardner, The Types of Greek Coins, ch. ii. p. 12; see below, p. 26, note 1.

³ Or, "since the town had been friendly to Tissaphernes."

Hellenic mercenaries in the service of Abrocomas, who deserted him for Cyrus, and joined in the campaign against the king.

From Issi, he marched a single stage—five parasangs—to the gates of Cilicia and Syria. This was a double fortress: the inner and nearer one, which protects Cilicia, was held by Syennesis and a garrison of Cilicians; the outer and further one, protecting Syria, was reported to be garrisoned by a body of the king's troops. Through the gap between the two fortresses flows a river named the Carsus, which is a hundred feet broad, and the whole space between was scarcely more than six hundred yards.¹ To force a passage here would be impossible, so narrow was the pass itself, with the fortification walls stretching down to the sea, and precipitous rocks above; while both fortresses were furnished with gates. It was the existence of this pass which had induced Cyrus to send for the fleet, so as to enable him to lead a body of hoplites inside and outside the gates; and so to force a passage through the enemy, if he were guarding the Syrian gate, as he fully expected to find Abrocomas doing with a large army. This, however, Abrocomas had not done; but as soon as he learnt that Cyrus was in Cilicia, he had turned round and made his exit from Phoenicia, to join the king with an army amounting, as report said, to three hundred thousand men.

From this point Cyrus pursued his march through Syria a single stage—five parasangs—to Myriandus, a city inhabited by Phoenicians, on the sea-coast. This was a commercial port, and numerous merchant vessels were riding at anchor in the harbour. Here they halted seven days, and here Xenias the Arcadian general, and Pasion the Megarian got on board a trader, and having stowed away their most valuable effects, set sail for home; most people explained the act as the outcome of a fit of jealousy, because Cyrus had allowed Clearchus to retain their men, who had deserted to him, in hopes of returning to Hellas instead of marching against the king; when the two had so vanished, a rumour spread that Cyrus was after them with some ships of war, and some hoped the cowards² might be caught, others pitied them, if that should be their fate.

¹ Lit. "three stades" = 606 yds. 2 ft. 3 in.

² Reading δειλούς: al. δολίους = "the treacherous fellows."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

broad. A large and flourishing city, named Thapsacus, stands on its banks. Here they halted five days, and here Cyrus sent for the generals of the Hellenes, and told them that the advance was now to be upon Babylon, against the great king ; he bade them communicate this information to the soldiers and persuade them to follow. The generals called an assembly, and announced the news to the soldiers. The latter were indignant and angry with the generals, accusing them of having kept secret what they had long known ; and refused to go, unless such a bribe of money were given them as had been given to their predecessors, when they went up with Cyrus to the court of his father, not as now to fight a battle, but on a peaceful errand—the visit of a son to his father by invitation. The demand was reported to Cyrus by the generals, and he undertook to give each man five silver minae¹ as soon as Babylon was reached, and their pay in full, until he had safely conveyed them back to Ionia again. In this manner the Hellenic force were persuaded,—that is to say, the majority of them. Menon, indeed, before it was clear what the rest of the soldiers would do—whether, in fact, they would follow Cyrus or not—collected his own troops apart and made them the following speech : “ Men,” he said, “ if you will listen to me, there is a method by which, without risk or toil, you may win the special favour of Cyrus beyond the rest of the soldiers. You ask what it is I would have you to do ? I will tell you. Cyrus at this instant is begging the Hellenes to follow him to attack the king. I say then : Cross the Euphrates at once, before it is clear what answer the rest will make ; if they vote in favour of following, you will get the credit of having set the example, and Cyrus will be grateful to you. † He will look upon you as being the heartiest in his cause ; he will repay, as of all others he best knows how ; while, if the rest vote against crossing, we shall all go back again ; but as the sole adherents, whose fidelity he can altogether trust, it is you whom Cyrus will turn to account, as commandants of garrisons or captains of companies. You need only ask him for whatever you want, and you will get it from him, as being the friends of Cyrus.”

The men heard and obeyed, and before the rest had given their answer, they were already across. But when Cyrus perceived that Menon's troops had crossed, he was well pleased, and he sent Glus to the division in question, with this message : " Soldiers, accept my thanks at present ; eventually you shall thank me. I will see to that, or my name is not Cyrus." The soldiers therefore could not but pray heartily for his success ; so high their hopes ran. But to Menon, it was said, he sent gifts with lordly liberality. This done, Cyrus proceeded to cross ; and in his wake followed the rest of the armament to a man. As they forded, never a man was wetted above the chest : nor ever until this moment, said the men of Thapsacus, had the river been so crossed on foot, boats had always been required ; but these, at the present time, Abrocomas, in his desire to hinder Cyrus from crossing, had been at pains to burn. Thus the passage was looked upon as a thing miraculous ; the river had manifestly retired before the face of Cyrus, like a courtier bowing to his future king. From this place he continued his march through Syria nine stages—fifty parasangs—and they reached the river Araxes. Here were several villages full of corn and wine ; in which they halted three days, and provisioned the army.

¹ £20 : 6 : 3 ; one mina = £4 : 1 : 3.

v.—Thence he marched on through Arabia, keeping the Euphrates on the right, five desert stages—thirty-five parasangs. In this region the ground was one long level plain, stretching far and wide like the sea, full of absinth ; whilst all the other vegetation, whether wood or reed, was sweet scented like spice or sweet herb ; there were no trees ; but there was wild game of all kinds—wild asses in greatest abundance, with plenty of ostriches ; besides these, there were bustards and antelopes. These creatures were occasionally chased by the cavalry. The asses, when pursued, would run forward a space, and then stand still—their pace being much swifter than that of horses ; and as soon as the horses came close, they went through the same performance. The only way to catch them was for the riders to post themselves at intervals, and to hunt them in relays, as it were. The flesh of those they captured was not unlike venison, only more tender. No one was lucky enough to capture an ostrich. Some of the troopers did give chase, but it had soon to be abandoned ; for the bird, in its effort to escape, speedily put a long interval between itself and its pursuers ; plying its legs at full speed, and using its wings the while like a sail. The bustards were not so hard to catch when started suddenly ; for they take only short flights, like partridges, and are soon tired. Their flesh is delicious.

As the army wended its way through this region, they reached the river Mascas, which is one hundred feet in breadth. Here stood a big deserted city called Corsote, almost literally environed by the stream, which flows round it in a circle. Here they halted three days and provisioned themselves. Hence they continued their march thirteen desert stages—ninety parasangs—with the Euphrates still on their right, until they reached the Gates. On these marches several of the baggage animals perished of hunger, for there was neither grass nor green herb, or tree of any sort ; but the country throughout was barren. The inhabitants make their living by quarrying millstones on the river banks, which they work up and take to Babylon and sell, purchasing corn in exchange for their goods. Corn failed the army, and was not to be got for money, except in the Lydian market open in Cyrus's Asiatic army ; where a kapithe of wheat or barley cost four shekels ;¹ the shekel being equal to seven and a half Attic obols, whilst the kapithe is the equivalent of two Attic choenices,² dry measure, so that the soldiers subsisted on meat alone for the whole period. Some of the stages were very long, whenever they had to push on to find water or fodder ; and once they found themselves involved in a narrow way, where the deep clay presented an obstacle to the progress of the wagons. Cyrus, with the nobles about him, halted to superintend the operation, and ordered Glus and Pigres to take a body of barbarians and to help in extricating the wagons. As they seemed to be slow about the business, he turned round angrily to the Persian nobles and bade them lend a hand to force the wagons out. Then, if ever, what goes to constitute one branch of good discipline, was to be witnessed. Each of

¹ 3s. 8d. nearly ; 1 σίγλος (or "shekel") = 7½ obols. 1 obol = about 1½d.

² The choenix = about 1 quart (or, according to others, 1½ pint). It was the minimum allowance of corn for a man, say a slave, per diem. The Spartan was allowed at the public table 2 choenices a day. See Herod. VI. lvii. 3 ; and Arnold's note to Thuc. iv. 6.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

horseback, to his tent, and had to pass through Menon's quarters. Cyrus had not yet come up, but was riding up in the same direction. One of Menon's men, who was splitting wood, caught sight of Clearchus as he rode past, and aimed a blow at him with his axe. The aim took no effect; when another hurled a stone at him, and a third, and then several, with shouts and hisses. Clearchus made a rapid retreat to his own troops, and at once ordered them to get under arms. He bade his hoplites remain in position with their shields resting against their knees, while he, at the head of his Thracians and horsemen, of which he had more than forty in his army—Thracians for the most part—advanced against Menon's soldiers, so that the latter, with Menon himself, were panicstricken, and ran to seize their arms; some even stood riveted to the spot, in perplexity at the occurrence. Just then Proxenus came up from behind, as chance would have it, with his division of hoplites, and without a moment's hesitation marched into the open space between the rival parties, and grounded arms; then he fell to begging Clearchus to desist. The latter was not too well pleased to hear his trouble mildly spoken of, when he had barely escaped being stoned to death; and he bade Proxenus retire and leave the intervening space open. At this juncture Cyrus arrived and inquired what was happening. There was no time for hesitation. With his javelins firmly grasped in his hands he galloped up,—escorted by some of his faithful bodyguard, who were present—and was soon in the midst, exclaiming: "Clearchus, Proxenus, and you other Hellenes yonder, you know not what you do. As surely as you come to blows with one another, our fate is sealed—this very day I shall be cut to pieces, and so will you: your turn will follow close on mine. Let our fortunes once take an evil turn, and these barbarians whom you see around will be worse foes to us than those who are at present serving with the king." At these words Clearchus came to his senses. Both parties paused from battle, and retired to their quarters: order reigned.

VI.—As they advanced from this point (opposite Charmande), they came upon the hoof-prints and dung of horses at frequent intervals. It looked like the trail of some two thousand horses. Keeping ahead of the army, these fellows burnt up the grass and everything else that was good for use. Now there was a Persian, named Orontas ; he was closely related to the king by birth : and in matters pertaining to war reckoned among the best of Persian warriors. Having formerly been at war with Cyrus, and afterwards reconciled to him, he now made a conspiracy to destroy him. He made a proposal to Cyrus : if Cyrus would furnish him with a thousand horsemen, he would deal with these troopers, who were burning down everything in front of them ; he would lay an ambuscade and cut them down, or he would capture a host of them alive ; in any case, he would put a stop to their aggressiveness and burnings ; he would see to it that they did not ever get a chance of setting eyes on Cyrus's army and reporting its advent to the king. The proposal seemed plausible to Cyrus, who accordingly authorised Orontas to take a detachment from each of the generals, and be gone. He, thinking that he had got his horsemen ready to his hand, wrote a letter to the king, announcing that he would ere long join him with as many troopers as he could bring ; he bade him, at the same time, instruct the royal cavalry to welcome him on arrival as a friend. The letter further contained certain reminders of his former friendship and fidelity. This despatch he delivered into the hands of one who ~~was~~ a trusty messenger, as he thought ; but the bearer took and gave it to Cyrus. Cyrus read it. Orontas was arrested. Then Cyrus summoned to his tent seven of the noblest Persians among his personal attendants, and sent orders to the Hellenic generals to bring up a body of hoplites. These troops were to take up a position round his tent. This the generals did ; bringing up about three thousand hoplites. Clearchus was also invited inside, to assist at the court-martial ; a compliment due to the position he held among the other generals, in the opinion not only of Cyrus, but also of the rest of the court. When he came out, he reported the circumstances of the trial (as to which, indeed, there was no mystery) to his friends. He said that Cyrus opened the inquiry with these words : " I have invited you hither, my friends, that I may take advice with you, and carry out whatever, in the sight of God and man, it is right for me to do, as concerning the man before you, Orontas. The prisoner was, in the first instance, given to me by my father, to be my faithful subject. In the next place, acting, to use his own words, under the orders of my brother, and having hold of the acropolis of Sardis, he went to war with me. I met war with war, and forced him to think it more prudent to desist from war with me: whereupon we shook hands, exchanging solemn pledges. After that," and at this point Cyrus turned to Orontas, and addressed him personally,—“after that, did I do you any wrong?” Answer, “Never.” Again, another question: “Then later on, having received, as you admit, no injury from me, did you revolt to the Mysians and injure my territory, as far as in you lay?”—“I did,” was the reply. “Then, once more having discovered the limits of your power, did you flee to the altar of Artemis, crying out that you repented? and did you thus work upon my feelings, that we a second time shook hands and made interchange of solemn pledges? Are these things so?” Orontas again assented. “Then what injury have you received from me,” Cyrus asked, “that now for the third time, you have been detected in a treasonous plot against me?”—“No injury,” Orontas replied. And Cyrus asked once more: “You plead guilty to having sinned against me?”—“I must needs do so,” he answered. Then Cyrus put one more question: “But the day may come, may it not, when you will once again be hostile to my brother, and a faithful friend to myself?” The other answered: “Even if I were, you could never be brought to believe it, Cyrus.”

At this point Cyrus turned to those who were present and said: “Such has been the conduct of the prisoner in the past: such is his language now. I now call upon you, and you first, Clearchus, to declare your opinion—what think you?” And Clearchus answered: “My advice to you is to put this man out of the way as soon as may be, so that we may be saved the necessity of watching him,¹ and have more leisure, as far as he is concerned, to requite the services of those whose friendship is sincere.”—“To this opinion,” he told us, “the rest of the court adhered.” After that, at the bidding of Cyrus,

¹ φυλάττεσθαι, i.e. “need not to guard against him,” “watch his movements.”

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

am ashamed to think, what a sorry set of folk you will find the inhabitants of this land to be. But you are men, and brave you must be, being men :¹ it is agreed ; then if you wish to return home, any of you, I undertake to send you back, in such sort that your friends at home shall envy you ; but I flatter myself I shall persuade many of you to accept what I will offer you here, in lieu of what you left at home."

Here Gaulites,² a Samian exile, and a trusty friend of Cyrus, being present, exclaimed : " Ay, Cyrus, but some say you can afford to make large promises now, because you are in the crisis of impending danger ; but let matters go well with you, will you recollect ? They shake their heads. Indeed, some add that, even if you did recollect, and were ever so willing, you would not be able to make good all your promises, and repay." When Cyrus heard that, he answered : " You forget, sirs, my father's empire stretches southwards to a region where men cannot dwell by reason of the heat, and northwards to a region uninhabitable through cold ; but all the intervening space is mapped out in satrapies belonging to my brother's friends : so that if the victory be ours, it will be ours also to put our friends in possession in their room. On the whole my fear is, not that I may not have enough to give to each of my friends, but lest I may not have friends enough on whom to bestow what I have to give, and to each of you Hellenes I will give a crown of gold."

So they, when they heard these words, were more elated than ever themselves, and spread the good news among the rest outside. And there came into his presence both the generals and some of the other Hellenes also, claiming to know what they should have in the event of victory ; and Cyrus satisfied the expectation of each and all, and so dismissed them. Now the advice and admonition of all who came into conversation with him was, not to enter the battle himself, but to post himself in rear of themselves ; and at this season Clearchus put a question to him : " But do you think that your brother will give battle to you, Cyrus ? " and Cyrus answered : " Not without a battle, be assured, shall the prize be won ; if he be the son of Darius and Parysatis, and a brother of mine."

¹ Reading with Sauppe, ὑμῶν δὲ ἀνδρῶν ὄντων καὶ εὐτόλμων γενομένων, ἐγὼ κ.τ.λ. : or, reading with Hug [ὑμῶν δὲ ἀνδρῶν ὄντων], καὶ εὖ τῶν ἐμῶν γενομένων, ἐγὼ κ.τ.λ., translate "[but you are men], and if my affairs turn out well, I," etc.

² For a namesake of this man, a Carian, speaking both Greek and Persian, see Thuc. viii. 85, unless, indeed, they are the same person.

In the final arming for battle at this juncture, the numbers were as follows : Of Hellenes there were ten thousand four hundred heavy infantry¹ with two thousand five hundred targeteers, while the barbarians with Cyrus reached a total of one hundred thousand. He had too about twenty scythe-chariots. The enemy's forces were reported to number one million two hundred thousand, with two hundred scythe-chariots, besides which he had six thousand cavalry under Artagerses. These formed the immediate vanguard of the king himself. The royal army was marshalled by four generals or field-m Marshals, each in command of three hundred thousand men. Their names were Abrocomas, Tissaphernes, Gobryas, and Arbaces. (But of this total not more than nine hundred thousand were engaged in the battle, with one hundred and fifty scythe-chariots ; since Abrocomas, on his march from Phoenicia, arrived five days too late for the battle.) Such was the information brought to Cyrus by deserters who came in from the king's army before the battle, and it was corroborated after the battle by those of the enemy who were taken prisoners.

From this place Cyrus advanced one stage—three parasangs—with the whole body of his troops, Hellenic and barbarian alike in order of battle. He expected the king to give battle the same day, for in the middle of this day's march a deep sunk trench was reached, thirty feet broad, and eighteen feet deep. The trench was carried inland through the plain, twelve parasangs' distance, to the wall of Media.² [Here are canals, flowing from the river Tigris ; they are four in number, each a hundred feet broad, and very deep, with corn ships plying upon them; they empty themselves into the Euphrates, and are at intervals of one parasang apart, and are spanned by bridges.]

¹ Lit. " the shield," i.e. shield-force (ἀσπίς) numbered ten thousand four hundred, as we speak of " horse," " guns," etc. ; for the numbers see above, p. 5, note 7 ; also for hoplites (shields) and peltasts (targeteers) p. 82, note 1.

² For " the wall of Media " see Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. ix. p. 87 and foll. note 1 (1st ed.), and various authorities there quoted or referred to (see below, p. 52, note 1, and p. 87, note 1). The next passage enclosed in [] may possibly be a commentator's or editor's note, but, on the whole, I have thought it best to keep the words in the text instead of relegating them, as heretofore, to a note. Perhaps some future traveller may clear up all difficulties.

Between the Euphrates and the trench was a narrow passage, twenty feet only in breadth. The trench itself had been constructed by the great king upon hearing of Cyrus's approach, to serve as a line of defence. Through this narrow passage then Cyrus and his army passed, and found themselves safe inside the trench. So there was no battle to be fought with the king that day; only there were numerous unmistakable traces of horse and infantry in retreat. Here Cyrus summoned Silanus, his Ambraciot soothsayer, and presented him with three thousand darics;¹ because eleven days back, when sacrificing, he had told him that the king would not fight within ten days, and Cyrus had answered: "Well, then, if he does not fight within that time, he will not fight at all; and if your prophecy comes true, I promise you ten talents." So now, that the ten days were passed, he presented him with the above sum.

But as the king had failed to hinder the passage of Cyrus's army at the trench, Cyrus himself and the rest concluded that he must have abandoned the idea of offering battle, so that next day Cyrus advanced with less than his former caution. On the third day he was conducting the march, seated in his carriage, with only a small body of troops drawn up in front of him. The mass of the army was moving on in no kind of order: the soldiers having consigned their heavy arms to be carried in the wagons or on the backs of beasts.

VIII.—It was already about full market time² and the halting-place at which the army was to take up quarters was nearly reached, when Pategyas, a Persian, a trusty member of Cyrus's personal staff, came galloping up at full speed on his horse, which was bathed in sweat, and to every one he met he shouted in Greek and Persian, as fast as he ¹ The daric would now be worth about £1 : 2 : 2½ (see above, p. 13, note 2), but it is to be noted that "Cyrus pays a bet of 10 Attic talents (60,000 drachmas) with 3000 darics, which shows that the daric was then worth 20 drachmas, or only about 13s. 4d. The difference in these two results comes from the change in the proportional values of gold and silver. In antiquity (at this date) the proportion was about 10 : 1; now it is more than 16 : 1." See Goodwin and White, Anab., ad loc.

² I.e. between 9 and 10 A.M.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

densely-crowded squares. And all along their front was a line of chariots at considerable intervals from one another,—the famous scythe-chariots, as they were named,—having their scythes fitted to the axle-trees and stretching out slantwise, while others protruded under the chariot-seats, facing the ground, so as to cut through all they encountered. The design was to let them dash full speed into the ranks of the Hellenes and cut them through.

Curiously enough the anticipation of Cyrus, when at the council of war he admonished the Hellenes not to mind the shouting of the Asiatics, was not justified. Instead of shouting, they came on in deep silence, softly and slowly, with even tread. At this instant, Cyrus, riding past in person, accompanied by Pigres, his interpreter, and three or four others, called aloud to Clearchus to advance against the enemy's centre, for there the king was to be found: "And if we strike home at this point," he added, "our work is finished." Clearchus, though he could see the compact body at the centre, and had been told by Cyrus that the king lay outside the Hellenic left (for, owing to numerical superiority, the king, while holding his own centre, could well overlap Cyrus's extreme left), still hesitated to draw off his right wing from the river, for fear of being turned on both flanks; and he simply replied, assuring Cyrus that he would take care all went well.

At this time the barbarian army was evenly advancing, and the Hellenic division was still riveted to the spot, completing its formation as the various contingents came up. Cyrus, riding past at some distance from the lines, glanced his eye first in one direction and then in the other, so as to take a complete survey of friends and foes; when Xenophon the Athenian, seeing him, rode up from the Hellenic quarter to meet him, asking whether he had any orders to give. Cyrus, pulling up his horse, begged him to make the announcement generally known that the omens from the victims, internal and external alike, were good.¹ While he was still speaking, he heard a confused murmur passing through the ranks, and asked what it meant. The other replied that it was the watchword being passed down for the second time. Cyrus wondered who had given the order, and asked what the watchword was. On being told it was "Zeus our Saviour and Victory," he replied, "I accept it ; so let it be," and with that remark rode away to his own position. And now the two battle lines were no more than three or four furlongs apart, when the Hellenes began chanting the paean, and at the same time advanced against the enemy.

¹ Lit. "that the λεπὰ were good, and the σφάγια were good," i.e. the omens from inspecting the inwards of the victims, and the omens from the acts and movements of the victims. See Goodwin and White, ad loc.; also Sturz, Lex. Xen. sub verbo, τὰ λεπὰ.

But with the forward movement a certain portion of the line curved onwards in advance, with wave-like sinuosity,¹ and the portion left behind quickened to a run ; and simultaneously a thrilling cry burst from all lips, like that in honour of the war-god—eleleu ! eleleu ! and the running became general. Some say they clashed their shields and spears, thereby causing terror to the horses ;² and before they had got within arrowshot the barbarians swerved and took to flight. And now the Hellenes gave chase with might and main, checked only by shouts to one another not to race, but to keep their ranks. The enemy's chariots, reft of their charioteers, swept onwards, some through the enemy themselves, others past the Hellenes. They, as they saw them coming, opened a gap and let them pass. One fellow, like some dumbfounded mortal on a race-course, was caught by the heels,³ but even he, they said, received no hurt ; nor indeed, with the single exception of some one on the left wing who was said to have been wounded by an arrow, did any Hellene in this battle suffer a single hurt.

Cyrus, seeing the Hellenes conquering, as far as they at any rate were concerned, and in hot pursuit, was well content ; but in spite of his joy and the salutations offered him at that moment by those about him, as though he were already king, he was not led away to join in the pursuit, but keeping his squadron of six hundred horsemen in close order, waited and watched to see what the king himself would do. The king, he knew, held the centre of the Persian army. Indeed it is the fashion for the Asiatic monarch to occupy that position during action, for this twofold reason: he holds the safest place, with his troops on either side of him, while, if he has occasion to despatch any necessary order along the lines, his troops will receive the message in half the time. The king accordingly on this occasion held the centre of his army, but for all that, he was outside Cyrus's left wing; and seeing that no one offered him battle in front, nor yet the troops in front of him, he wheeled as if to encircle the enemy. It was then that Cyrus, in apprehension lest the king might get round to the rear and cut to pieces the Hellenic body, charged to meet him. Attacking with his six hundred, he mastered the line of troops in front of the king, and put to flight the six thousand, cutting down, as is said, with his own hand their general, Artagerses.

¹ Or, "billowed out." See Goldsmith, Essay xvi., on "Metaphor," who translates the word ἐξερύμναι, "part of the phalanx fluctuated on the march."

² Some critics regard this sentence as an editor's or commentator's note. Cobet omits it. Hug encloses the words in brackets. See also Mure's Hist. of Gr. Lit. vol. v. p. 368 ; History of Classical Gr. Lit. (Mahaffy), vol. ii. x. 263. 1st ed. 1880.

³ Or, "one fellow, indeed, was caught, while he gazed about him in blank astonishment, as if he had been on a racecourse."

But as soon as the rout commenced, Cyrus's own six hundred themselves, in the ardour of pursuit, were scattered, with the exception of a handful who were left with Cyrus himself—chiefly his table companions, so-called. Left alone with these, he caught sight of the king and the close throng about him. Unable longer to contain himself, with a cry, "I see the man," he rushed at him and dealt a blow at his chest, wounding him through the corselet. This, according to the statement of Ctesias the surgeon,¹ who further states that he himself healed the wound. As Cyrus delivered the blow, some one struck him with a javelin under the eye severely; and in the struggle which then ensued between the king and Cyrus and those about them to protect one or other, we have the statement of ¹ "Ctesias, the son of Ctesiochus, was a physician of Cnidos. Seventeen years of his life were passed at the court of Persia, fourteen in the service of Darius, three in that of Artaxerxes; he returned to Greece in 398 B.C.," and "was employed by Artaxerxes in diplomatic services." See Mure, op. cit. iv. xvi. § 2; also Ch. Müller, ap. Didot, for his life and works. He wrote (1) a history of Persian affairs in three parts—Assyrian, Median, Persian—with a chapter "On Tributes;" (2) a history of Indian affairs (Written in the vein of Sir John Maundevile, Kt.); (3) a Periplus; (4) a treatise on Mountains; (5) a treatise on Rivers.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

was he held by men in general to be at once the aptest of learners and the most eager practiser. As soon as his age permitted, the same pre-eminence showed itself in his fondness for the chase, not without a certain appetite for perilous adventure in facing the wild beasts themselves. Once a bear made a furious rush at him,¹ and without wincing he grappled with her, and was pulled from his horse, receiving wounds the scars of which were visible through life; but in the end he slew the creature, nor did he forget him who first came to his aid, but made him enviable in the eyes of many.

After he had been sent down by his father to be satrap of Lydia and Great Phrygia and Cappadocia, and had been appointed general of the forces, whose business it is to muster in the plain of the Castolus, nothing was more noticeable in his conduct than the importance which he attached to the faithful fulfilment of every treaty or compact or undertaking entered into with others. He would tell no lies to any one. Thus doubtless it was that he won the confidence alike of individuals and of the communities entrusted to his care; or in case of hostility, a treaty made with Cyrus was a guarantee sufficient to the combatant that he would suffer nothing contrary to its terms. Therefore, in the war with Tissaphernes, all the states of their own accord chose Cyrus in lieu of Tissaphernes, except only the men of Milctus, and these were only alienated through fear of him, because he refused to abandon their exiled citizens; and his deeds and words bore emphatic witness to his principle: even if they were weakened in number or in fortune, he would never abandon those who had once become his friends.

He made no secret of his endeavour to outdo his friends and his foes alike in reciprocity of conduct. The prayer has been attributed to him, "God grant I may live long enough to recompense my friends and requite my foes with a strong arm." However this may be, no one, at least in our days, ever drew together so ardent a following of friends, eager to lay at his feet their money, their cities, their own lives and persons; nor is it to be inferred from this that he suffered the malefactor and the wrongdoer to laugh him to scorn ; on the contrary, these he punished most unflinchingly. It was no rare sight to see on the well-trodden highways, men who had forfeited hand or foot or eye ; the result being that throughout the satrapy of Cyrus any one, Hellene or barbarian, provided he were innocent, might fearlessly travel wherever he pleased, and take with him whatever he felt disposed. However, as all allowed, it was for the brave in war that he reserved especial honour. To take the first instance to hand, he had a war with the Pisidians and Mysians. Being himself at the head of an expedition into those territories, he could observe those who voluntarily encountered risks ; these he made rulers of the territory which he subjected, and afterwards honoured them with other gifts. So that, if the good and brave were set on a pinnacle of fortune, cowards were recognised as their natural slaves ; and so it befel that Cyrus never had lack of volunteers in any service of danger, whenever it was expected that his eye would be upon them.

¹ Cf. Cyrop. I. iv. 8. The elder Cyrus, when a boy, kills not a bear but a boar.

So again, wherever he might discover any one ready to distinguish himself in the service of uprightness,¹ his delight was to make this man richer than those who seek for gain by unfair means. On the same principle, his own administration was in all respects uprightly conducted, and, in particular, he secured the services of an army worthy of the name. Generals, and subalterns alike, came to him from across the seas, not merely to make money, but because they saw that loyalty to Cyrus was a more profitable investment than so many pounds a month. Let any man whatsoever render him willing service, such enthusiasm was sure to win its reward. And so Cyrus could always command the service of the best assistants, it was said, whatever the work might be.

Or if he saw any skilful and just steward who furnished well the country over which he ruled, and created revenues, so far from robbing him at any time, to him who had, he delighted to give more. So that toil was a pleasure, and gains were amassed with confidence, and least of all from Cyrus would a man conceal the amount of his possessions, seeing that he showed no jealousy of wealth openly avowed, but his endeavour was rather to turn to account the riches of those who kept them secret. Towards the friends he had made, whose kindness he knew, or whose fitness as fellow-workers with himself, in aught which he might wish to carry out, he had tested, he showed himself in turn an adept in the arts of courtesy. Just in proportion as he felt the need of this friend or that to help him, so he tried to help each of them in return in whatever seemed to be their heart's desire.

¹ The Greek word is δικαιοσύνη = justice or social uprightness (in N. T. "righteousness.") Cf. Xen. Mem. IV. vi. 5, 6.

Many were the gifts bestowed on him, for many and diverse reasons; no one man, perhaps, ever received more; no one, certainly, was ever more ready to bestow them on others, with an eye ever to the taste of each, so as to gratify what he saw to be the individual requirement. Many of these presents were sent to him to serve as personal adornments of the body or for battle; and as touching these he would say, "How am I to deck myself out in all these? to my mind a man's chief ornament is the adornment of nobly-adorned friends." Indeed, that he should triumph over his friends in the great matters of welldoing is not surprising, seeing that he was much more powerful than they, but that he should go beyond them in minute attentions, and in an eager desire to give pleasure, seems to me, I must confess, more admirable. Frequently when he had tasted some specially excellent wine, he would send the half remaining flagon to some friend with a message to say: "Cyrus says, this is the best wine he has tasted for a long time, that is his excuse for sending it to you. He hopes you will drink it up to-day with a choice party of friends." Or, perhaps, he would send the remainder of a dish of geese, half loaves of bread, and so forth, the bearer being instructed to say: "This is Cyrus's favourite dish, he hopes you will taste it yourself."¹ Or, perhaps; there was a great dearth of provender, when, through the number of his servants and his own careful forethought, he was enabled to get supplies for himself; at such times he would send to his friends in different parts, bidding them feed their horses on his hay, since it would not do for the horses that carried his friends to go starving.²

¹ Or, "Cyrus finds this viand excellent, he hopes."

² Or, "to be mere skeletons."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

the camp followers on guard. These fell at once into line and put to the sword many of the pillagers, though they lost some men themselves; they stuck to the place and succeeded in saving not only that lady, but all else, whether chattels or human beings, which lay within their reach.

At this point the king and the Hellenes were something like three miles¹ apart; the one set were pursuing their opponents just as if their conquest had been general; the others were pillaging as merrily as if their victory were already universal. But when the Hellenes learnt that the king and his troops were in the baggage camp; and the king, on his side, was informed by Tissaphernes that the Hellenes were victorious in their quarter of the field, and had gone forward in pursuit, the effect was instantaneous. The king massed his troops and formed into line. Clearchus summoned Proxenus, who was next him, and debated whether to send a detachment or to go in a body to the camp to save it.

Meanwhile the king was seen again advancing, as it seemed, from the rear; and the Hellenes, turning right about, prepared to receive his attack then and there. But, instead of advancing upon them at that point, he drew off, following the line by which he had passed earlier in the day, outside the left wing of his opponent, and so picked up in his passage those who had deserted to the Hellenes during the battle,² as also Tissaphernes and his division. The latter had not fled in the first shock of the encounter; he had charged parallel to the line of the Euphrates into the Greek peltasts, and through them. But charge as he might, he did not lay low a single man. On the contrary, the Hellenes made a gap to let them through, hacking them with their swords and hurling their javelins as they passed. Episthenes of Amphipolis was in command of the peltasts, and he showed himself a sensible man, it was said. Thus it was that Tissaphernes, having got through haphazard, with rather the worst of it, failed to wheel round and return the way he came, but reaching the camp of the Hellenes, there fell in with the king; and falling into order again, the two divisions advanced side by side.

¹ Lit. "about thirty stades"; the "stade" = 606 ft. 9 in.; the furlong = 660 ft.; about 8½ stades = 1 mile.

² Or lit. "those opposite to the Hellenes who had deserted during the battle."

When they were parallel with ¹ the (original) left wing of the Hellenes, fear seized the latter lest they might take them in flank and enfold them on both sides and cut them down. In this apprehension they determined to extend their line and place the river on their rear. But while they deliberated, the king passed by and ranged his troops in line to meet them, in exactly the same position in which he had advanced to offer battle at the commencement of the engagement. The Hellenes, now seeing them in close proximity and in battle order, once again raised the paeon and began the attack with still greater enthusiasm than before: and once again the barbarians did not wait to receive them, but took to flight, even at a greater distance than before. The Hellenes pressed the pursuit until they reached a certain village, where they halted, for above the village rose a mound, on which the king and his party rallied and reformed; they had no infantry any longer, but the crest was crowded with cavalry, so that it was impossible to discover what was happening. They did see, they said, the royal standard, a kind of golden eagle, with wings extended, perched on a bar of wood and raised upon a lance.²

But as soon as the Hellenes again moved onwards, the hostile cavalry at once left the hillock—not in a body any longer, but in fragments—some streaming from one side, some from another; and the crest was gradually stripped of its occupants, till at last the company was gone. Accordingly, Clearchus did not ascend the crest, but posting his army at its base, he sent Lycius of Syracuse and another to the summit, with orders to inspect the condition of things on the other side, and to report results. Lycius galloped up and reconnoitred, bringing back news that they were fleeing might and main. Almost at that instant the sun sank beneath the horizon. There the Hellenes halted ; they ordered arms and rested, marvelling the while that Cyrus was not anywhere to be seen, and that no messenger had come from him. For they were in complete ignorance of his death, and conjectured that either he had gone off in pursuit, or had pushed forward to occupy some point. Left to themselves, they now deliberated, whether they should stay where they were and have the baggage train brought up, or should return to camp. They resolved to return, and about supper time reached the tents. Such was the conclusion of this day.

¹ Lit. "in a line with," or "opposite."

² Or, "with spread wings perched on the cusp of a lance." So Suidas and Hesychius interpret πέλτη. Mr. Pretor translates "a golden eagle upon a shield (resting), with outstretched wings upon a staff." Some critics, e.g. Cobet and Hug, regard the words ἐπὶ ξύλον (perched) "on a bar of wood," as spurious.

They found the larger portion of their property pillaged. eatables and drinkables alike, not excepting the wagons laden with corn and wine, which Cyrus had prepared in case of some extreme need overtaking the expedition, to divide among the Hellenes. There were four hundred of these wagons, it was said, and these had now been ransacked by the king and his men ; so that the greater number of the Hellenes went supperless, having already gone without their breakfasts, since the king had appeared before the usual halt for breakfast. Accordingly, in no better plight than this they passed the night.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

BOOK II. I. 1-4.

[In the previous book will be found a full account of the method by which Cyrus collected a body of Greeks when meditating an expedition against his brother Artaxerxes; as also of various occurrences on the march; of the battle itself, and of the death of Cyrus; and lastly, a description of the arrival of the Hellenes in camp after the battle, and as to how they took themselves to rest, none suspecting but what they were altogether victorious and that Cyrus lived.]

1.—With the break of day the generals met, and were surprised that Cyrus should not have appeared himself, or at any rate have sent some one to tell them what to do. Accordingly, they resolved to put what they had together, to get under arms, and to push forward until they effected junction with Cyrus. Just as they were on the point of starting, with the rising sun came Procles the ruler of Teuthrania. He was a descendant of Damaratus¹ the Laconian, and with him also came Glus the son of Tamos. These two told them, first, that Cyrus was dead; next, that Ariaeus had retreated with the rest of the barbarians to the halting-place whence they had started at dawn on the previous day; and wished to inform them that, if they were minded to come, he would wait for this one day, but on the morrow he should return home again to Ionia, whence he came.

When they heard these tidings, the generals were sorely distressed ; so too were the rest of the Hellenes when they were informed of it. Then Clearchus spoke as follows : “ Would that Cyrus were yet alive ! But since he is dead, take back this answer to Ariaeus, that we, at any rate, have conquered the king ; and, as you yourselves may see, there is not a man left in the field to meet us. Indeed, had you not arrived, we should ere this have begun our march upon the king. Now, we can promise to Ariaeus that, if he will join us here, we will place him on the king’s throne. Surely to those who conquer empire pertains.” With these words he sent back the messengers, and with them he sent Cheirisophus the Laconian, and Menon the Thessalian. That was what Menon himself wished, being, as he was, a friend and intimate of Ariaeus, and bound by mutual ties of hospitality. So these set off, and Clearchus waited for them.

¹ The Spartan king who was deposed in B.C. 491, whereupon he fled to King Darius, and settled in south-western Mysia. See Herod. vi. 50, 61-70. We shall hear more of his descendant, Procles, the ruler of Teuthrania, in the last chapter of this work, see below, p. 239; also Hell. III. i. 6. For Glus see above, p. 17; and for Tamos, p. 13.

The soldiers furnished themselves with food [and drink] as best they might—falling back on the baggage animals, and cutting up oxen and asses. There was no lack of firewood ; they need only step forward a few paces from the line where the battle was fought, and they would find arrows to hand in abundance, which the Hellenes had forced the deserters from the king to throw away. There were arrows and wicker shields also, and the huge wooden shields of the Egyptians. There were many targets also, and empty wagons left to be carried off. Here was a store which they were not slow to make use of to cook their meat and serve their meals that day.

It was now about full market hour ¹ when heralds from the king and Tissaphernes arrived. These were barbarians with one exception. This was a certain Phalinus, a Hellene who lived at the court of Tissaphernes, and was held in high esteem. He gave himself out to be a connoisseur of tactics and the art of fighting with heavy arms. These were the men who now came up, and having summoned the generals of the Hellenes, they delivered themselves of the following message : “ The great king having won the victory and slain Cyrus, bids the Hellenes to surrender their arms ; to betake themselves to the gates of the king’s palace, and there obtain for themselves what terms they

¹ 10 A.M. See above, p. 26, note 2.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

words, and said: "Spoken like a philosopher, my fine young man, and very pretty reasoning too ; yet, let me tell you, your wits are somewhat scattered if you imagine that your valour will get the better of the king's power." There were one or two others, it was said, who with a touch of weakness in their tone or argument, made answer: "They had proved good and trusty friends to Cyrus, and the king might find them no less valuable. If he liked to be friends with them, he might turn them to any use that pleased his fancy, say for a campaign against Egypt. Their arms were at his service ; they would help to lay that country at his feet."

Just then Clearchus returned, and wished to know what answer they had given. The words were barely out of his mouth before Phalinus interrupting, answered: "As for your friends here, one says one thing and one another ; will you please give us your opinion" ; and he replied: "The sight of you, Phalinus, caused me much pleasure ; and not only me, but all of us, I feel sure ; for you are a Hellene even as we are—every one of us whom you see before you. In our present plight we would like to take you into our counsel as to what we had better do touching your proposals. I beg you then solemnly, in the sight of heaven,—do you tender us such advice as you shall deem best and worthiest, and such as shall bring you honour in after time, when it will be said of you how once on a time Phalinus was sent by the great king to bid certain Hellenes yield up their arms, and when they had taken him into their counsel, he gave them such and such advice. You know that whatever advice you do give us cannot fail to be reported in Hellas."

Clearchus threw out these leading remarks in hopes that this man, who was the ambassador from the king, might himself be led to advise them not to give up their arms, in which case the Hellenes would be still more sanguine and hopeful. But, contrary to his expectation, Phalinus turned round and said: "I say that if you have one chance, one hope in ten thousand to wage a war with the king successfully, do not give up your arms. That is my advice. If, however, you have no chance of escape without the king's consent, then I say save yourselves in the only way you can." And Clearchus answered :

“So, then, that is your deliberate view? Well, this is our answer, take it back. We conceive that in either case, whether we are expected to be friends with the king, we shall be worth more as friends if we keep our arms than if we yield them to another; or whether we are to go to war, we shall fight better with them than without.” And Phalinus said: “That answer we will repeat; but the king bade me tell you this besides, ‘Whilst you remain here there is truce; but one step forward or one step back, the truce ends; there is war.’ Will you then please inform us as to that point also? Are you minded to stop and keep truce, or is there to be war? What answer shall I take from you?” And Clearchus replied: “Pray answer that we hold precisely the same views on this point as the king.”—“How say you the same views?” asked Phalinus. Clearchus made answer: “As long as we stay here there is truce, but a step forward or a step backward, the truce ends; there is war.” The other again asked: “Peace or war, what answer shall I make?” Clearchus returned answer once again in the same words: “Truce if we stop, but if we move forwards or backwards war.” But what he was minded really to do, that he refused to make further manifest.

II.—Phalinus and those that were with him turned and went. But the messengers from Ariaeus, Procles, and Cheirisophus came back. As to Menon, he stayed behind with Ariaeus. They brought back this answer from Ariaeus: “‘There are many Persians,’ he says, ‘better than himself who will not suffer him to sit upon the king’s throne; but if you are minded to go back with him, you must join him this very night, otherwise he will set off himself to-morrow on the homeward route.’” And Clearchus said: “It had best stand thus between us then. If we come, well and good, be it as you propose; but if we do not come, do whatsoever you think most conducive to your interests.” And so he kept these also in the dark as to his real intention.

After this, when the sun was already sinking, he summoned the generals and officers, and made the following statement: “Sirs, I sacrificed and found the victims unfavourable to an advance against the king. After all, it is not so surprising perhaps, for, as I now learn, between us and the king flows the river Tigris, navigable for big vessels, and we could not possibly cross it without boats, and boats we have none. On the other hand, to stop here is out of the question, for there is no possibility of getting provisions. However, the victims were quite agreeable to our joining the friends of Cyrus. This is what we must do then. Let each go away and sup on whatever he has. At the first sound of the bugle to turn in, get kit and baggage together ; at the second signal, place them on the baggage animals ; and at the third, fall in and follow the lead, with the baggage animals on the inside protected by the river, and the troops outside." After hearing the orders, the generals and officers retired and did as they were bid ; and for the future Clearchus led, and the rest followed in obedience to his orders, not that they had expressly chosen him, but they saw that he alone had the sense and wisdom requisite in a general, while the rest were inexperienced.¹

Here, under cover of the darkness which descended, the Thracian Miltocythes, with forty horsemen and three hundred Thracian infantry, deserted to the king ; but the rest of the troops—Clearchus leading and the rest following in accordance with the orders promulgated—took their departure, and about midnight reached their first stage, having come up with Ariaeus and his army. They grounded arms just as they stood in rank, and the generals and officers of the Hellenes met in the tent of Ariaeus. There they exchanged oaths—the Hellenes on the one side and Ariaeus with his principal officers on the other—not to betray one another, but to be true to each other as allies. The Asiatics further solemnly pledged themselves by oath to lead the way without treachery. The oaths were ratified by the sacrifice of a bull, a wolf,² a boar, and a ram over a shield. The Hellenes dipped a sword, the barbarians a lance, into the blood of the victims.

As soon as the pledge was taken, Clearchus spoke : " And now, Ariaeus," he said, " since you and we have one expedition

¹ The MSS. add the words, " The total distance of the route, taking Ephesus in Ionia as the starting point up to the field of battle, consisted of 93 stages, 535 parasangs, or 16,050 furlongs ; from the battle-field to Babylon (reckoned a three days' journey) would have been another 360 stades," which may well be an editor's or commentator's marginal note.

² It is a question whether the words " a wolf " ought not to be omitted.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

ing against any appearance of flight. Accordingly he marched straight as an arrow, and with sunset entered the nearest villages with his vanguard and took up quarters.

These villages had been thoroughly sacked and dismantled by the royal army—down to the very woodwork and furniture of the houses. Still, the vanguard contrived to take up their quarters in some sort of fashion ; but the rear division, coming up in the dark, had to bivouac as best they could, one detachment after another ; and a great noise they made, with hue and cry to one another, so that the enemy could hear them ; and those in their immediate proximity actually took to their heels, left their quarters, and decamped, as was plain enough next morning, when not a beast was to be seen, nor sign of camp or wreath of smoke anywhere in the neighbourhood. The king, as it would appear, was himself quite taken aback by the advent of the army ; as he fully showed by his proceedings next day.

During the progress of this night the Hellenes had their turn of scare,—a panic seized them, and there was a noise and clatter, hardly to be explained except by the visitation of some sudden terror. But Clearchus had with him the Eleian Tolmides, the best herald of his time ; him he ordered to proclaim silence, and then to give out this proclamation of the generals : “ Whoever will give any information as to who let an ass into the camp shall receive a talent of silver in reward.” On hearing this proclamation the soldiers made up their minds that their fear was baseless, and their generals safe and sound. At break of day Clearchus gave the order to the Hellenes to get under arms in line of battle, and take up exactly the same position as they held on the day of the battle.

III.—And now comes the proof of what I stated above—that the king was utterly taken aback by the sudden apparition of the army ; only the day before, he had sent and demanded the surrender of their arms—and now, with the rising sun, came heralds sent by him to arrange a truce. These, having reached the advanced guard, asked for the generals. The guard reported their arrival ; and Clearchus, who was busy inspecting the ranks, sent back word to the heralds that they must await his leisure. Having carefully arranged the troops so that from every side they might present the appearance of a compact battle line without a single unarmed man in sight, he summoned the ambassadors, and himself went forward to meet them with the soldiers, who for choice accoutrement and noble aspect were the flower of his force ; a course which he had invited the other generals also to adopt.

And now, being face to face with the ambassadors, he questioned them as to what their wishes were. They replied that they had come to arrange a truce, and were persons competent to carry proposals from the king to the Hellenes and from the Hellenes to the king. He returned answer to them : " Take back word then to your master, that we need a battle first, for we have had no breakfast ; and he will be a brave man who will dare mention the word ' truce ' to Hellenes without providing them with breakfast." With this message the heralds rode off, but were back again in no time, which was a proof that the king, or some one appointed by him to transact the business, was hard by. They reported that " the message seemed reasonable to the king ; they had now come bringing guides who, if a truce were arranged, would conduct them where they would get provisions." Clearchus inquired " whether the truce was offered to the individual men merely as they went and came, or to all alike." " To all," they replied, " until the king receives your final answer." When they had so spoken, Clearchus, having removed the ambassadors, held a council ; and it was resolved to make a truce at once, and then quietly to go and secure provisions ; and Clearchus said : " I agree to the resolution ; still I do not propose to announce it at once, but to wile away time till the ambassadors begin to fear that we have decided against the truce ; though I suspect," he added, " the same fear will be operative on the minds of our soldiers also." As soon as the right moment seemed to have arrived, he delivered his answer in favour of the truce, and bade the ambassadors at once conduct them to the provisions.

So these led the way ; and Clearchus, without relaxing precaution, in spite of having secured a truce, marched after them with his army in line and himself in command of the rearguard. Over and over again they encountered trenches and conduits so full of water that they could not be crossed without bridges ; but they contrived well enough for these by means of trunks of palm trees which had fallen, or which they cut down for the occasion. And here Clearchus's system of superintendence was a study in itself ; as he stood with a spear in his left hand and a stick in the other ; and when it seemed to him there was any dawdling among the parties told off to the work, he would pick out the right man and down would come the stick ; nor, at the same time, was he above plunging into the mud and lending a hand himself, so that every one else was forced for very shame to display equal alacrity. The men told off for the business were the men of thirty years of age ; but even the elder men, when they saw the energy of Clearchus, could not resist lending their aid also. What stimulated the haste of Clearchus was the suspicion in his mind that these trenches were not, as a rule, so full of water, since it was not the season to irrigate the plain ; and he fancied that the king had let the water on for the express purpose of vividly presenting to the Hellenes the many dangers with which their march was threatened at the very start.

Proceeding on their way they reached some villages, where their guides pointed out to them they were to take provisions. They were found to contain plenty of corn, and wine made from palm dates, and an acidulated beverage extracted by boiling from the same fruit. As to the palm nuts or dates themselves, it was noticeable that the sort which we are accustomed to see in Hellas were set aside for the domestic servants ; those put aside for the masters are picked specimens, and are simply marvellous for their beauty and size, looking like great golden lumps of amber ; some specimens they dried and preserved as sweetmeats. Sweet enough they were as an accompaniment of wine, but apt to give headache. Here, too, for the first time in their lives, the men tasted the brain¹ of the palm. No one could help being struck by the beauty of this object, and the peculiarity of its delicious flavour ; but this, like the dried fruits, was exceedingly apt to give headache. When this cabbage or brain has been removed from the palm the whole tree withers from top to bottom.

• ¹ i.e. the cabbage-like crown.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

the sake of which we would care to injure the king's country ; we would not choose to kill him if we could, rather we would march straight home, if we were not molested ; but, God helping us, we will retaliate on all who injure us. On the other hand, if any be found to benefit us, we do not mean to be outdone in kindly deeds, as far as in us lies."

So he spoke, and Tissaphernes listened and replied : "That answer will I take back to the king and bring you word from him again. Until I come again, let the truce continue, and we will furnish you with a market." All next day he did not come back, and the Hellenes were troubled with anxieties, but on the third day he arrived with the news that he had obtained from the king the boon he asked ; he was permitted to save the Hellenes, though there were many gainsayers who argued that it was not seemly for the king to let those who had marched against him depart in peace. And at last he said : "You may now, if you like, take pledges from us, that we will make the countries through which you pass friendly to you, and will lead you back without treachery into Hellas, and will furnish you with a market ; and wherever you cannot purchase, we will permit you to take provisions from the district. You, on your side, must swear that you will march as through a friendly country, without damage—merely taking food and drink wherever we fail to supply a market—or, if we afford a market, you shall only obtain provisions by paying for them." This was agreed to, and oaths and pledges exchanged between them—Tissaphernes and the king's brother-in-law upon the one side, and the generals and officers of the Hellenes on the other. After this Tissaphernes said : "And now I go back to the king ; as soon as I have transacted what I have a mind to, I will come back, ready equipped, to lead you away to Hellas, and to return myself to my own dominion."

iv.—After these things the Hellenes and Ariaeus waited for Tissaphernes, being encamped close to one another : for more than twenty days they waited, during which time there came visitors to Ariaeus, his brother and other kinsfolk. To those under him came certain other Persians, encouraging them and bearing pledges to some of them from the king himself —that he would bear no grudge against them on account of the part they bore in the expedition against him with Cyrus, or for aught else of the things which were past. Whilst these overtures were being made, Ariaeus and his friends gave manifest signs of paying less attention to the Hellenes, so much so that, if for no other reason, the majority of the latter were not well pleased, and they came to Clearchus and the other generals, asking what they were waiting for. “Do we not know full well,” they said, “that the king would give a great deal to destroy us, so that other Hellenes may take warning and think twice before they march against the king. To-day it suits his purpose to induce us to stop here, because his army is scattered; but as soon as he has got together another armament,¹ attack us most certainly he will. How do we know he is not at this moment digging away at trenches, or running up walls, to make our path impassable. It is not to be supposed that he will desire us to return to Hellas with a tale how a handful of men like ourselves beat the king at his own gates, laughed him to scorn, and then came home again.” Clearchus replied: “I too am keenly aware of all this; but I reason thus: if we turn our backs now, they will say, we mean war and are acting contrary to the truce, and then what follows? First of all, no one will furnish us with a market or means of providing ourselves with food. Next, we shall have no one to guide us; moreover, such action on our part will be a signal to Ariaeus to hold aloof from us, so that not a friend will be left to us; even those who were formerly our friends will now be numbered with our enemies. What other river, or rivers, we may find we have to cross, I do not know; but this we know, to cross the Euphrates in face of resistance is impossible. You see, in the event of being driven to an engagement, we have no cavalry to help us, but with the enemy it is the reverse—not only the most, but the best of his troops are cavalry, so that if we are victorious, we shall kill no one, but if we are defeated, not a man of us can escape. For my part, I cannot see why the king, who has so many advantages on his side, if he desires to destroy us, should swear oaths and tender solemn pledges merely in order to perjure himself in the sight of heaven, to render his word worthless and his credit discreditable the wide world over." These arguments he propounded at length.

¹ Or, more lit., “got together his full armament;” “re-collected his army.”

Meanwhile Tissaphernes came back, apparently ready to return home; he had his own force with him, and so had Orontas, who was also present, his. The latter brought, moreover, his bride with him, the king's daughter, whom he had just wedded. The journey was now at length fairly commenced. Tissaphernes led the way, and provided a market. They advanced, and Ariaeus advanced too, at the head of Cyrus's Asiatic troops, side by side with Tissaphernes and Orontas, and with these two he also pitched his camp. The Hellenes, holding them in suspicion, marched separately with the guides, and they encamped on each occasion a parasang apart, or rather less; and both parties kept watch upon each other as if they were enemies, which hardly tended to lull suspicion; and sometimes, whilst foraging for wood and grass and so forth on the same ground, blows were exchanged, which occasioned further embitterments. Three stages they had accomplished ere they reached the wall of Media, as it is called, and passed within it.¹ It was built of baked bricks laid upon bitumen. It was twenty feet broad and a hundred feet high, and the length of it was said to be twenty parasangs.² It lies at no great distance from Babylon.

From this point they marched two stages—eight parasangs—and crossed two canals, the first by a regular bridge, the other spanned by a bridge of seven boats. These canals issued from the Tigris, and from them a whole system of minor trenches was cut, leading over the country, large ones to begin with, and then smaller and smaller, till at last they become the merest runnels, like those in Hellas used for watering millet fields. They reached the river Tigris. At this point there was a large and thickly populated city named

¹ Or. "passed along it"; the words are παρῆλθον εἰσω αὐτοῦ. See Mr. Pretor, Anab. of Xen., appendix to note on II. iv. 12; and Grote's note on the wall of Media, already referred to above, p. 25; also below, p. 87, note 1.

² I.e. taking the parasang as = 30 stades, nearly 3½ English miles, or nearly 3 geographical miles, the wall was nearly 70 miles long.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

the canal might be?" "A large district," he replied, "and in it are villages and cities numerous and large." Then it dawned upon them: the barbarians had sent the man with subtlety, in fear lest the Hellenes should cut the bridge and occupy the island territory, with the strong defences of the Tigris on the one side and of the canal on the other; supplying themselves with provisions from the country so included, large and rich as it was, with no lack of hands to till it; in addition to which, a harbour of refuge and asylum would be found for any one, who was minded to do the king a mischief.

After this they retired to rest in peace, not, however, neglecting to send a guard to occupy the bridge in spite of all; but nothing happened, and there was no attack from any quarter whatsoever; nor did any of the enemy's people approach the bridges: so the guards were able to report next morning. But as soon as it was morning, they proceeded to cross the bridge, which consisted of thirty-seven vessels, and in so doing they used the utmost precaution possible; for reports were brought by some of the Hellenes with Tissaphernes that an attempt was to be made to attack them while crossing. All this turned out to be false, though it is true that while crossing they did catch sight of Glus watching, with some others, to see if they crossed the river; but as soon as he had satisfied himself on that point, he rode off and was gone.

From the river Tigris they advanced four stages—twenty parasangs—to the river Phycus, which is a hundred feet broad and spanned by a bridge. Here lay a large and populous city named Opis, close to which the Hellenes were encountered by the natural brother of Cyrus and Artaxerxes, who was leading a large army from Susa and Ecbatana to assist the king. He halted his troops and watched the Hellenes march past. Clearchus led them in column two abreast: and from time to time he marched and from time to time he halted. But every time the vanguard came to a standstill, just so often and just so long the effect repeated itself down to the hindmost man: halt! halt! halt! along the whole line: so that even to the Hellenes themselves their army seemed enormous; and the Persian was fairly astonished at the spectacle.

From this place they marched through Media six desert stages—thirty parasangs—to the villages of Parysatis,¹ Cyrus's and the king's mother. These Tissaphernes, in mockery of Cyrus, delivered over to the Hellenes to plunder, except that the folk in them were not to be made slaves. They contained much corn, cattle, and other property. From this place they advanced four desert stages—twenty parasangs—keeping the Tigris on the left. On the first of these stages, on the other side of the river, lay a large city; it was a well-to-do place named Caenae, from which the natives used to carry across loaves and cheeses and wine on rafts made of skins.

v.—After this they reached the river Zapatas,² which is four hundred feet broad, and here they halted three days. During the interval suspicions were rife, though no act of treachery displayed itself. Clearchus accordingly resolved to seek an interview with Tissaphernes, and if possible to bring to an end these feelings of mistrust, before they led to war. Consequently, he sent a messenger to the Persian to say that he desired an interview with him; to which the other readily consented. As soon as they were met, Clearchus spoke as follows: "Tissaphernes," he said, "I do not forget that oaths have been exchanged between us, and right hands shaken, in token that we will abstain from mutual injury; but I can see that you watch us narrowly, as if we were foes; and we, seeing this, watch you narrowly in return. But as I fail to discover, after investigation, that you are endeavouring to do us a mischief—and I am quite sure that nothing of the sort has ever entered our heads with regard to you—the best plan seemed to me to come and talk the matter over with you, so that, if possible, we might dispel the mutual distrust on either side. For I have known people ere now, the victims in some cases of calumny, or possibly of mere suspicion, who in apprehension of one another and eager to deal the first blow, have committed irreparable wrong against those who neither intended nor so much as harboured a thought of mischief against them.

¹ See above, p. 15, note 1.

² The Greater Zab, which flows into the Tigris near a town now called Senn, with which most travellers identify Caenae (Kawal). See Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. ix. p. 93 (1st ed.) See map.

I have come to you under a conviction that such misunderstandings may best be put a stop to by personal intercourse, and I wish to instruct you plainly that you are wrong in mistrusting us. The first and weightiest reason is that the oaths, which we took in the sight of heaven, are a barrier to mutual hostility. I envy not the man whose conscience tells him that he has disregarded these! For in a war with heaven, by what swiftness of foot can a man escape?—in what quarter find refuge?¹—in what darkness slink away and be hid?—to what strong fortress scale and be out of reach? Are not all things in all ways subject to the gods? is not their lordship over all alike outspread? As touching the gods, therefore, and our oaths, that is how I view this matter. To their safe keeping we consigned the friendship which we solemnly contracted.² But turning to matters human, you I look upon as our greatest blessing in this present time. With you every path is plain to us, every river passable, and of provisions we shall know no stint. But without you, all our way is through darkness; for we know nothing concerning it, every river will be an obstacle, each multitude a terror; but, worst terror of all, the vast wilderness, so full of endless perplexity. Nay, if in a fit of madness we murdered you, what then? in slaying our benefactor should we not have challenged to enter the lists against us a more formidable antagonist in the king himself?³ Let me tell you, how many high hopes I should rob myself of, were I to take in hand to do you mischief.

“I coveted the friendship of Cyrus; I believed him to be abler than any man of his day to benefit those whom he chose; but to-day I look and, behold, it is you who are in his place;

¹ Reading with Sauppe οὔτε ὅποι αὖ τις φεύγων; or, With Hug, omitting the words οὔτε ὅποι αὖ, translate “can a man flee away and escape? into what darkness,” etc.; for the sentiment of the passage compare the language of Psalm cxxxix. 7-12.

² Or, “they witnessed our covenant of friendship; they are the depositaries of its terms.”

³ The Greek is more graphic, lit. “the greatest reserve combatant,” the metaphor being taken from the public games, in which “the odd man,” who has not been paired, sits by ready to engage any athlete who shall beat his adversary. See W. W. Goodwin and J. W. White ad loc.; also Mr. Pretor ad loc. Cf. Virg. Aen. xi. 278, devictam Asiam subsedet adulter: of Agamemnon. “Asia fell before him, but the adulterer rose in her room.”—Conington.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

without risk of suffering in return? or, possibly, do we seem to you to lack the physical surroundings suitable for attacking you? Do you not see all these great plains, which you find it hard enough to traverse even when they are friendly? and all yonder great mountain chains left for you to cross, which we can at any time occupy in advance and render impassable? and all those rivers, on whose banks we can deal craftily¹ by you, checking and controlling and choosing the right number of you whom we care to fight! Nay, there are some which you will not be able to cross at all, unless we transport you to the other side.

“And if at all these points we were worsted, yet ‘fire,’ as they say, ‘is stronger than the fruit of the field’: we can burn it down and call up famine in arms against you; against which you, for all your bravery, will never be able to contend. Why then, with all these avenues of attack, this machinery of war, open to us, not one of which can be turned against ourselves, why should we select from among them all that method, which alone in the sight of God is impious and of man abominable? Surely it belongs to people altogether without resources, who are helplessly struggling in the toils of fate, and are villains to boot, to seek accomplishment of their desires by perjury to heaven and faithlessness to their fellows. We are not so unreasoning, Clearchus, nor so foolish.

“Why, when we had it in our power to destroy you, did we not proceed to do it? Know well that the cause of this was nothing less than my passion to prove myself faithful to the Hellenes, and that, as Cyrus went up, relying on a foreign force attracted by payment, I in turn might go down strong in the same through service rendered. Various ways in which you Hellenes may be useful to me you yourself have mentioned, but there is one still greater. It is the great king’s privilege alone to wear the tiara upright upon his head, yet in your presence it may be given to another mortal to wear it upright, here, upon his heart.”

Throughout this speech he seemed to Clearchus to be speaking the truth, and he rejoined: “Then are not those worthy of the worst penalties who, in spite of all that exists to cement our friendship, endeavour by slander to make us enemies?" "Even so," replied Tissaphernes, "and if your generals and captains care to come in some open and public way, I will name to you those who tell me that you are plotting against me and the army under me." "Good," replied Clearchus. "I will bring all, and I will show you, on my side, the source from which I derive my information concerning you."

¹ Cf. Cyrop. III. iii. 47. ταμείνεσθαι = to deal economically or piecemeal by.

After this conversation Tissaphernes, with kindest expressions, invited Clearchus to remain with him at the time, and entertained him at dinner. Next day Clearchus returned to the camp, and made no secret of his persuasion that he at any rate stood high in the affections of Tissaphernes, and he reported what he had said, insisting that those invited ought to go to Tissaphernes, and that any Hellene convicted of calumnious language ought to be punished, not only as traitors themselves, but as disaffected to their fellow-countrymen. The slanderer and traducer was Menon; so, at any rate, he suspected, because he knew that he had had meetings with Tissaphernes whilst he was with Ariaeus, and was factiously opposed to himself, plotting how to win over the whole army to him, as a means of winning the good graces of Tissaphernes. But Clearchus wanted the entire army to give its mind to no one else, and that refractory people should be put out of the way. Some of the soldiers protested: the captains and generals had better not all go; it was better not to put too much confidence in Tissaphernes. But Clearchus insisted so strongly that finally it was arranged for five generals to go and twenty captains. These were accompanied by about two hundred of the other soldiers, who took the opportunity of marketing.

On arrival at the doors of Tissaphernes's quarters the generals were summoned inside. They were Proxenus the Boeotian, Menon the Thessalian, Agias the Arcadian, Clearchus the Laconian, and Socrates the Achaean; while the captains remained at the doors. Not long after, at one and the same signal, those within were seized and those without cut down; after which some of the barbarian horsemen galloped over the plain, killing every Hellene they encountered, bond or free. The Hellenes, as they looked from the camp, viewed that strange horsemanship with surprise, and could not explain to themselves what it all meant, until Nicarchus the Arcadian came tearing along for bare life with a wound in the belly, and clutching his protruding entrails in his hands. He told them all that had happened. Instantly the Hellenes ran to their arms, one and all, in utter consternation, and fully expecting that the enemy would instantly be down upon the camp. However, they did not all come: only Ariaeus came, and Artaozus and Mithridates, who were Cyrus's most faithful friends; but the interpreter of the Hellenes said he saw and recognised the brother of Tissaphernes also with them. They had at their back other Persians also, armed with cuirasses, as many as three hundred. As soon as they were within a short distance, they bade any general or captain of the Hellenes who might be there to approach and hear a message from the king. After this, two Hellene generals went out with all precaution. These were Cleanor the Orchomenian,¹ and Sophaenetes the Stymphalian, attended by Xenophon the Athenian, who went to learn news of Proxenus. Cheirisophus was at the time away in a village with a party getting provisions. As soon as they had halted within earshot, Ariæus said: "Hellenes, Clearchus being shown to have committed perjury and to have broken the truce, has suffered the penalty, and he is dead; but Proxenus and Menon, in return for having given information of his treachery, are in high esteem and honour. As to yourselves, the king demands your arms. He claims them as his, since they belonged to Cyrus, who was his slave." To this the Hellenes made answer by the mouth of Cleanor of Orchomenus, their spokesman, who said, addressing Ariaeus: "Thou villain, Ariaeus, and you the rest of you, who were Cyrus's friends, have you no shame before God or man, first to swear to us you would have the same friends and the same enemies as we ourselves, and then to turn and betray us, making common cause with Tissaphernes, that most impious and villainous of men? With him you have murdered the very men to whom you gave your solemn

¹ Of Orchomenus in Arcadia.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

army with it, carried on war against the Thracians and conquered them in battle, and from that date onwards harried and plundered them with war incessantly, until Cyrus wanted his army ; whereupon he at once went off, in hopes of finding another sphere of warfare in his company.

These, I take it, were the characteristic acts of a man whose affections are set on warfare. When it is open to him to enjoy peace with honour, no shame, no injury attached, still he prefers war ; when he may live at home at ease, he insists on toil, if only it may end in fighting ; when it is given to him to keep his riches without risk, he would rather lessen his fortune by the pastime of battle. To put it briefly, war was his mistress ; just as another man will spend his fortune on a favourite, or to gratify some pleasure, so he chose to squander his substance on soldiering.

But if the life of a soldier was a passion with him, he was none the less a soldier born, as herein appears ; danger was a delight to him ; he courted it, attacking the enemy by night or by day ; and in difficulties he did not lose his head, as all who ever served in a campaign with him would with one consent allow. A good soldier ! the question arises, Was he equally good as a commander ? It must be admitted that, as far as was compatible with his quality of temper, he was : none more so. Capable to a singular degree of devising how his army was to get supplies, and of actually getting them, he was also capable of impressing upon those about him that Clearchus must be obeyed ; and that he brought about by the very hardness of his nature. With a scowling expression and a harshly-grating voice, he chastised with severity, and at times with such fury, that he was sorry afterwards himself for what he had done. Yet it was not without purpose that he applied the whip ; he had a theory that there was no good to be got out of an unchastened army. A saying of his is recorded to the effect that the soldier who is to mount guard and keep his hands off his friends, and be ready to dash without a moment's hesitation against the foe—must fear his commander more than the enemy. Accordingly, in any strait, this was the man whom the soldiers were eager to obey, and they would have no other in his place. The cloud which lay upon his brow,¹ at those times lit up with brightness ; his face became radiant, and the old sternness was so charged with vigour and knitted strength to meet the foe, that it savoured of salvation, not of cruelty. But when the pinch of danger was past, and it was open to them to go and taste subordination under some other officer, many forsook him. So lacking in grace of manner was he ; but was ever harsh and savage, so that the feeling of the soldiers towards him was that of schoolboys to a master. In other words, though it was not his good fortune ever to have followers inspired solely by friendship or goodwill, yet those who found themselves under him, either by State appointment or through want, or other arch necessity, yielded him implicit obedience. From the moment that he led them to victory, the elements which went to make his soldiers efficient were numerous enough. There was the feeling of confidence in facing the foe, which never left them, and there was the dread of punishment at his hands to keep them orderly. In this way and to this extent he knew how to rule ; but to play a subordinate part himself he had no great taste ; so, at any rate, it was said. At the time of his death he must have been about fifty years of age.

Proxenus, the Boeotian, was of a different temperament. It had been the dream of his boyhood to become a man capable of great achievements. In obedience to this passionate desire it was, that he paid his fee to Gorgias of Leontini.² After enjoying that teacher's society, he flattered himself that he must be at once qualified to rule ; and while he was on friendly terms with the leaders of the age, he was not to be outdone in

¹ Reading ἐν τοῖς προσώποις : or, retaining ἐν τοῖς ἄλλοις προσώποις of the best MSS., translate perhaps, as Mr. Pretor (Anab. of Xen., vol. ii. p. 384), "his gloominess then shone as a bright light (reflected) in the faces of those around him." Cf. Cyrop. V. ii. 34 ; Mem. III. x. 4. Cf. Walt Whitman, Leaves of Grass, p. 79 (ed. 1860-61):—

"Serene stood the little captain,
He was not hurried ; his voice was neither high nor low ; reciprocity of service.¹ In this mood he threw himself into the projects of Cyrus, and in return expected to derive from this essay the reward of a great name, large power, and wide wealth. But for all that he pitched his hopes so high, it was none the less evident that he would refuse to gain any of the ends he set before him wrongfully. Righteously and honourably he would obtain them, if he might, or else forego them. As a commander he had the art of leading gentlemen, but he failed to inspire adequately either respect for himself or fear in the soldiers under him. Indeed, he showed a more delicate regard for his soldiers than his subordinates for him, and he was indisputably more apprehensive of incurring their hatred than they were of losing their fidelity. The one thing needful to real and recognised generalship was, he thought, to praise the virtuous and to withhold praise from the evildoer. It can be easily understood, then, that of those who were brought in contact with him, the good and noble indeed were his well-wishers; but he laid himself open to the machinations of the base, who looked upon him as a person to be dealt with as they liked. At the time of his death he was only thirty years of age.
His eyes gave more light to us than our battle lanterns."

² The famous rhetorician of Leontini, 485-380 B.C. His fee was 100 minae = about £405. See Sir R. Jebb, Attic Orators, vol. i., Introduction, p. cxxiii. and foll.

As to Menon the Thessalian,² the mainspring of his action was obvious; what he sought after insatiably was wealth. Rule he sought after only as a stepping-stone to larger spoils. Honours and high estate he craved for simply that he might extend the area of his gains; and if he studied to be on friendly terms with the powerful, it was in order that he might commit wrong with impunity. The shortest road to the achievement of his desires lay, he thought, through false swearing, lying, and cheating; for in his vocabulary simplicity and truth were synonyms of folly. Natural affection he clearly entertained

¹ Proxenus, like Cyrus (see above, p. 31, note 1), is to some extent a prototype of the Cyrus of the Cyropaedia. In other words, the author, in delineating the portrait of his ideal prince, drew from the recollection of many princely qualities observed by him in the characters of many friends. Apart from the intrinsic charm of the story, the Anabasis is interesting as containing the raw material of experience and reflection which "this young scholar or philosopher," our friend, the author, will one day turn to literary account.

² For a less repulsive conception of Menon's character, however unhistorical, see Plato's Meno, and Prof. Jowett's Introduction, Plato, vol. i. p. 265: "He is a Thessalian Alcibiades, rich and luxurious—a spoilt child of fortune."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

fell upon him, and he was put to death, not like Clearchus and the others by what would appear to be the speediest of deaths—decapitation—but, as report says, he lived for a year in pain and disgrace and died the death of a felon.

Agias the Arcadian, and Socrates the Achaean were both among the sufferers who were put to death. To the credit, be it said, of both, no one ever derided either as cowardly in war: no one ever had a fault to find with either on the score of friendship. They were both about thirty-five years of age.

BOOK III. 1. 3

[In the preceding pages of the narrative will be found a full account, not only of the doings of the Hellenes during the advance of Cyrus till the date of the battle, but of the incidents which befell them after Cyrus's death at the commencement of the retreat, while in company with Tissaphernes during the truce.]

1.—After the generals had been seized, and the captains and soldiers who formed their escort had been killed, the Hellenes lay in deep perplexity—a prey to painful reflections. Here were they at the king's gates, and on every side environing them were many hostile cities and tribes of men. Who was there now to furnish them with a market? Separated from Hellas by more than a thousand miles,¹ they had not even a guide to point the way. Impassable rivers lay athwart their homeward route, and hemmed them in. Betrayed even by the Asiatics, at whose side they had marched with Cyrus to the attack, they were left in isolation. Without a single mounted trooper to aid them in pursuit: was it not perfectly plain, that if they won a battle, their enemies would escape to a man, but if they were beaten themselves, not one soul of them would survive?

Haunted by such thoughts, and with hearts full of despair, but few of them tasted food that evening; but few of them kindled even a fire, and many never came into camp at all that night, but took their rest where each chanced to be. They could not close their eyes for very pain and yearning after their fatherlands or their parents, the wife or child whom they never expected to look upon again. Such was the plight in which each and all tried to seek repose.

¹ Lit. at least 10,000 stades.

Now there was in that host a certain man, an Athenian,¹ Xenophon, who had accompanied Cyrus, neither as a general, nor as an officer, nor yet as a private soldier, but simply on the invitation of an old friend, Proxenus. This old friend had sent to fetch him from home, promising, if he would come, to introduce him to Cyrus, "whom," said Proxenus, "I consider to be worth my fatherland and more to me."

Xenophon having read the letter, consulted Socrates the Athenian, whether he should accept or refuse the invitation. Socrates, who had a suspicion that the State of Athens might in some way look askance at any friendship with Cyrus,² whose zealous co-operation with the Lacedaemonians against Athens in the war was not forgotten, advised Xenophon to go to Delphi and there to consult the god as to the desirability of such a journey. Xenophon went and put the question to Apollo, to which of the gods he must pray and do sacrifice, so that he might best accomplish his intended journey and return in safety, with good fortune. Then Apollo answered him: "To such and such gods must thou do sacrifice," and when he had returned home he reported to Socrates the oracle. But he, when he heard, blamed Xenophon that he had not, in the first instance, inquired of the god, whether it were better for him to go or to stay, but had taken on himself to settle that point affirmatively, by inquiring straightway, how ¹ The reader should turn to Grote's comments on the first appearance of Xenophon. He has been mentioned, of course, more than once before; but he now steps, as the protagonist, upon the scene, and as Grote says: "It is in true Homeric vein, and in something like Homeric language, that Xenophon (to whom we owe the whole narrative of the expedition) describes his dream, or the intervention of Onairos, sent by Zeus, from which this renovating impulse took its rise" (Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. ix. p. 104). "Ἦν δέ τις ἐν τῇ στρατιᾷ Ξενοφῶν Ἀθηναῖος, ὃς οὔτε στρατηγός, κ.τ.λ., cf. Hom. Il. v. 9. "Ἦν δέ τις ἐν Τρώεσσι Δάρης, ἀφνειὸς ἀμύμων, ἱεὺς Ἡφαίστοιο, κ.τ.λ." "Now there was amid the Trojans Dares, rich and noble, priest of Hephaistos."—Mr. W. Leaf.

² Or, "Socrates, who suspected that a friendship with Cyrus might in some way be laid to his charge, and prejudice him with the state." Cf. Mem. I. i. 4. For the part played by Cyrus during the last four years of the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 407-405, see above, Hell. I. iv. ; v ; II. i. Socrates' apprehension was only too fully realised, if the story in any way be true that Xenophon was banished, φίλου χάριν Κύρου, on the ground of friendship with Cyrus, as the epigram in the Life of Xenophon by Diogenes Laertius has it.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

of sights, and to suffer the most fearful pains, and then to die, insulted, an ignominious death? To defend ourselves—to ward off that fate—not a hand stirs: no one is preparing, none cares; but here we lie, as though it were time to rest and take our ease. I too! what am I waiting for? a general to undertake the work? and from what city? am I waiting till I am older myself and of riper age?¹ older I shall never be, if to-day I betray myself to my enemies.

Thereupon he got up, and called together first Proxenus's officers; and when they were met, he said: "Sleep, sirs, I cannot, nor can you, I fancy, nor lie here longer, when I see in what straits we are. Our enemy, we may be sure, did not open war upon us till he felt he had everything amply ready; yet none of us shows a corresponding anxiety to enter the lists of battle in the bravest style.

"And yet, if we yield ourselves and fall into the king's power, need we ask what our fate will be? This man, who, when his own brother, the son of the same parents, was dead, was not content with that, but severed head and hand from the body, and nailed them to a cross. We, then, who have not even the tie of blood in our favour, but who marched against him, meaning to make a slave of him instead of a king—and to slay him if we could: what is likely to be our fate at his hands? Will he not go all lengths so that, by inflicting on us the extreme of ignominy and torture, he may rouse in the rest of mankind a terror of ever marching against him any more? There is no question but that our business is to avoid by all means getting into his clutches.

"For my part, all the while the truce lasted, I never ceased pitying ourselves and congratulating the king and those with him, as, like a helpless spectator, I surveyed the extent and quality of their territory, the plenteousness of their provisions, the multitude of their dependants, their cattle, their gold, and their apparel. And then to turn and ponder the condition of our soldiers, without part or lot in these good things, except we bought it; few, I knew, had any longer the wherewithal to buy, and yet our oath held us down, so that we could not provide ourselves otherwise than by purchase. I say, as I reasoned thus, there were times when I dreaded the truce more than I now dread war.

¹ See below for a list of passages bearing on the moot point of Xenophon's age at the date of the Anabasis, p. 82.

“Now, however, that they have abruptly ended the truce, there is an end also to their own insolence and to our suspicion. All these good things of theirs are now set as prizes for the combatants. To whichever of us shall prove the better men, will they fall as guerdons; and the gods themselves are the judges of the strife. The gods, who full surely will be on our side, seeing it is our enemies who have taken their names falsely; whilst we, with much to lure us, yet for our oath's sake, and the gods who were our witnesses, sternly held aloof. So that, it seems to me, we have a right to enter upon this contest with much more heart than our foes; and further, we are possessed of bodies more capable than theirs of bearing cold and heat and labour; souls too we have, by the help of heaven, better and braver; nay, the men themselves are more vulnerable, more mortal, than ourselves, if so be the gods vouchsafe to give us victory once again.

“Howbeit, for I doubt not elsewhere similar reflections are being made, whatsoever betide, let us not, in heaven's name, wait for others to come and challenge us to noble deeds; let us rather take the lead in stimulating the rest to valour. Show yourselves to be the bravest of officers, and among generals, the worthiest to command. For myself, if you choose to start forwards on this quest, I will follow; or, if you bid me lead you, my age shall be no excuse to stand between me and your orders. At least I am of full age, I take it, to avert misfortune from my own head.”

Such were the speaker's words; and the officers, when they heard, all, with one exception, called upon him to put himself at their head. This was a certain Apollonides there present, who spoke in the Boeotian dialect. This man's opinion was that it was mere nonsense for any one to pretend they could obtain safety otherwise than by an appeal to the king, if he had skill to enforce it; and at the same time he began to dilate on the difficulties. But Xenophon cut him short. “O most marvellous of men! though you have eyes to see, you do not perceive; though you have ears to hear, you do not recollect.

You were present with the rest of us now here when, after the death of Cyrus, the king, vaunting himself on that occurrence, sent dictatorially to bid us lay down our arms. But when we, instead of giving up our arms, put them on and went and pitched our camp near him, his manner changed. It is hard to say what he did not do, he was so at his wit's end, sending us embassies and begging for a truce, and furnishing provisions the while, until he had got it. Or to take the contrary instance, when just now, acting precisely on your principles, our generals and captains went, trusting to the truce, unarmed to a conference with them, what came of it? what is happening at this instant? Beaten, goaded with pricks, insulted, poor souls, they cannot even die: though death, I ween, would be very sweet. And you, who know all this, how can you say that it is mere nonsense to talk of self-defence? how can you bid us go again and try the arts of persuasion? In my opinion, sirs, we ought not to admit this fellow to the same rank with ourselves; rather ought we to deprive him of his captaincy, and load him with packs and treat him as such.¹ The man is a disgrace to his own fatherland and the whole of Hellas, that, being a Hellene, he is what he is."

Here Agasias the Stymphalian broke in, exclaiming: "Nay, this fellow has no connection either with Boeotia or with Hellas, none whatever. I have noted both his ears bored like a Lydian's." And so it was. Him then they banished. But the rest visited the ranks, and wherever a general was left, they summoned the general; where he was gone, the lieutenant-general; and where again the captain alone was left, the captain. As soon as they were all met, they seated themselves in front of the place d'armes: the assembled generals and officers, numbering about a hundred. It was nearly midnight when this took place.

Thereupon Hieronymus the Eleian, the eldest of Proxenus's captains, commenced speaking as follows: "Generals and captains, it seemed right to us, in view of the present crisis, ourselves to assemble and to summon you, that we might advise upon some practicable course. Would you, Xenophon, repeat what you said to us?"

¹ Or, "like the creature he is."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

of two combatants it is given to dash with stouter hearts to meet the foe, and such onset, in nine cases out of ten, those others refuse to meet. This observation, also, I have laid to heart, that they, who in matters of war seek in all ways to save their lives, are just they who, as a rule, die dishonourably ; whereas they who, recognising that death is the common lot and destiny of all men, strive hard to die nobly : these more frequently, as I observe, do after all attain to old age, or, at any rate, while life lasts, they spend their days more happily. This lesson let all lay to heart this day, for we are just at such a crisis of our fate. Now is the season to be brave ourselves, and to stimulate the rest by our example."

With these words he ceased ; and after him, Cheirisophus said : " Xenophon, hitherto I knew only so much of you as that you were, I heard, an Athenian, but now I must commend you for your words and for your conduct. I hope that there may be many more like you, for it would prove a public blessing." Then turning to the officers : " And now," said he, " let us waste no time ; retire at once, I beg you, and choose leaders where you need them. After you have made your elections, come back to the middle of the camp, and bring the newly appointed officers. After that, we will there summon a general meeting of the soldiers. Let Tolmides, the herald," he added, " be in attendance." With these words on his lips he got up, in order that what was needful might be done at once without delay. After this the generals were chosen. These were Timasion the Dardanian, in place of Clearchus ; Xanthicles, an Achaean, in place of Socrates ; Cleanor, an Arcadian, in place of Agias ; Philesius, an Achaean, in place of Menon ; and in place of Proxenus, Xenophon the Athenian.

II.—By the time the new generals had been chosen, the first faint glimmer of dawn had hardly commenced, as they met in the centre of the camp, and resolved to post an advance guard and to call a general meeting of the soldiers. Now, when these had come together, Cheirisophus the Lacedaemonian first rose and spoke as follows : " Fellow-soldiers, the present posture of affairs is not pleasant, seeing that we are robbed of so many generals and captains and soldiers ; and more than that, our former allies, Ariaeus and his men, have betrayed us ; still, we must rise above our circumstances to prove ourselves brave men, and not give in, but try to save ourselves by glorious victory if we can ; or, if not, at least die gloriously, and never, while we have breath in our bodies, fall into the hands of our enemies. In which latter case, I fear, we shall suffer things, which I pray the gods may visit rather upon those we hate."

At this point Cleanor the Orchomenian stood up and spoke as follows : " You see, men, the perjury and the impiety of the king. You see the faithlessness of Tissaphernes, professing that he was next-door neighbour to Hellas, and would give a good deal to save us, in confirmation of which he took an oath to us himself, he gave us the pledge of his right hand, and then, with a lie upon his lips, this same man turned round and arrested our generals. He had no reverence even for Zeus, the god of strangers ; but, after entertaining Clearchus at his own board as a friend, he used his hospitality to delude and decoy his victims. And Ariaeus, whom we offered to make king, with whom we exchanged pledges not to betray each other, even this man, without a particle of fear of the gods, or respect for Cyrus in his grave, though he was most honoured by Cyrus in lifetime, even he has turned aside to the worst foes of Cyrus, and is doing his best to injure the dead man's friends. Them may the gods requite as they deserve ! But we, with these things before our eyes, will not any more be cheated and cajoled by them ; we will make the best fight we can, and having made it, whatever the gods think fit to send, we will accept."

After him Xenophon arose ; he was arrayed for war in his bravest apparel : ¹ " For," said he to himself, " if the gods grant victory, the finest attire will match with victory best ; or if I must needs die, then for one who has aspired to the noblest, it is well there should be some outward correspondence between his expectation and his end." He began his speech

¹ So it is said of the Russian General Skobelev, that he had a strange custom of going into battle in his cleanest uniform, perfumed, and wearing a diamond-hilted sword, " in order that," as he said, " he might die in his best attire."

as follows: "Cleanor has spoken of the perjury and faithlessness of the barbarians, and you yourselves know them only too well, I fancy. If then we are minded to enter a second time into terms of friendship with them, with the experience of what our generals, who in all confidence entrusted themselves to their power, have suffered, reason would we should feel deep despondency. If, on the other hand, we purpose to take our good swords in our hands and to inflict punishment on them for what they have done, and from this time forward will be on terms of downright war with them, then, God helping, we have many a bright hope of safety." The words were scarcely spoken when some one sneezed,¹ and with one impulse the soldiers bowed in worship; and Xenophon proceeded: "I propose, sirs, since, even as we spoke of safety, an omen from Zeus the Saviour has appeared, we vow a vow to sacrifice to the Saviour thank-offerings for safe deliverance, wheresoever first we reach a friendly country; and let us couple with that vow another of individual assent,² that we will offer to the rest of the gods 'according to our ability.' Let all those who are in favour of this proposal hold up their hands." They all held up their hands, and there and then they vowed a vow and chanted the battle hymn. But as soon as these sacred³ matters were duly ended, he began once more thus: "I was saying that many and bright are the hopes we have of safety. First of all, we it is who confirm and ratify the oaths we take by heaven, but our enemies have taken false oaths and broken the truce, contrary to their solemn word. This being so, it is but natural that the gods should be opposed to our enemies, but with ourselves allied; the gods, who are able to make the great ones quickly small, and out of sore perplexity can save the little ones with ease, what time it pleases them. In the next place, let me recall to your minds the dangers of our own ¹ For this ancient omen see Odyssey, xvii. 541 (Butcher and Lang, p. 292): "Even so she spake, and Telemachus sneezed loudly, and around the roof rung Wondrously. And Penelope laughed." . . . "Dost thou not mark how my son has sneezed a blessing on all my words?" See also Aristoph. Birds, 720 (Prof. Kennedy, p. 70): "Bird an oracle of fate, bird a sneeze you designate." In Greek the word "bird" ὄρνις, or, as in the text, ὄρνις τοῦ Διὸς, "a bird of Zeus," means "omen." See below, p. 171, note 2.

² Cf. Mem. I. iii. 3.

³ Or, "when the favour of heaven seemed secured."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

day you have made trial of them, and knowing that, however many times your number, they do not care to await your onset, what concern have you now to be afraid of them ?

“Nor let any one suppose that herein is a point of weakness, in that Cyrus’s troops, who before were drawn up by your side, have now deserted us, for they are even worse cowards still than those we worsted. At any rate they have deserted us, and sought refuge with them. Leaders of the forlorn hope of flight—far better is it to have them brigaded with the enemy than shoulder to shoulder in our ranks. But if any of you is out of heart to think that we have no cavalry, while the enemy have many squadrons to command, lay to heart this doctrine, that ten thousand horse equal only the ten thousand men upon their backs,¹ neither less nor more. Did any one ever die in battle from the bite or kick of a horse ? It is the men, the real swordsmen, who do whatever is done in battles. In fact we, on our stout shanks, are better mounted than those cavalry fellows ; there they hang on to their horses’ necks in mortal dread, not only of us, but of falling off ; while we, well planted upon earth, can deal far heavier blows to our assailants, and aim more steadily at whom we will. There is one point, I admit, in which their cavalry have the whip-hand of us ; it is safer for them than it is for us to run away.

“May be, however, you are in good heart about the fighting, but annoyed to think that Tissaphernes will not guide us any more, and that the king will not furnish us with a market any longer. Now, consider, is it better for us to have a guide like Tissaphernes, whom we know to be plotting against us, or to take our chance of the stray people whom we catch and compel to guide us, who will know that any mistake made in leading us will be a sad mistake for their own lives ? Again, is it better to be buying provisions in a market of their providing, in scant measure and at high prices, without even the money to pay for them any longer ; or, by right of conquest, to help ourselves, applying such measure as suits our fancy best ?

“Or again, perhaps you admit that our present position is not without its advantages, but you feel sure that the rivers are a difficulty, and think that you were never more taken in

¹ For the humour of this passage cf. Cyrop. IV. iii. 15.

than when you crossed them ; if so, consider whether, after all, this is not perhaps the most foolish thing which the barbarians have done. No river is impassable throughout ; whatever difficulties it may present at some distance from its source, you need only make your way up to the springhead, and there you may cross it without wetting more than your ankles. But, granted that the rivers do bar our passage, and that guides are not forthcoming, what care we ? We need feel no alarm for all that. We have heard of the Mysians,¹ a people whom we certainly cannot admit to be better than ourselves ; and yet they inhabit numbers of large and prosperous cities in the king's own country without asking leave. The Pisidians¹ are an equally good instance, or the Lycaonians. We have seen with our own eyes how they fare : seizing fortresses down in the plains, and reaping the fruits of these men's territory. As to us, I go so far as to assert, we ought never to have let it be seen that we were bent on getting home : at any rate, not so soon ; we should have begun stocking and furnishing ourselves, as if we fully meant to settle down for life somewhere or other hereabouts. I am sure that the king would be thrice glad to give the Mysians as many guides as they like, or as many hostages as they care to demand, in return for a safe conduct out of his country ; he would make carriage roads for them, and if they preferred to take their departure in coaches and four, he would not say them nay. So too, I am sure, he would be only too glad to accommodate us in the same way, if he saw us preparing to settle down here. But, perhaps, it is just as well that we did not stop ; for I fear, if once we learn to live in idleness and to batten in luxury and dalliance² with these tall and handsome Median and Persian women and maidens, we shall be like the Lotus-eaters,³ and forget the road home altogether.

“ It seems to me that it is only right, in the first instance, to make an effort to return to Hellas and to revisit our hearths and homes, if only to prove to other Hellenes that it is their own faults if they are poor and needy,¹ seeing it is in their power to give to those now living a pauper life at home a free passage hither, and convert them into well-to-do burghers at once.² Now, sirs, is it not clear that all these good things belong to whoever has strength to hold them?

¹ Mysians, Pisidians, Lycaonians, see above, pp. 3. 7. 22. 33. 57 ; cf. Mem. III. v. 26.

² Or, “ to consort with.”

³ See Odyssey, ix. 94 (Butcher and Lang, p. 137), “ ever feeding on the Lotus and forgetful of returning.”

“Let us look another matter in the face. How are we to march most safely? or where blows are needed, how are we to fight to the best advantage? That is the question.

“The first thing which I recommend is to burn the wagons we have got, so that we may be free to march wherever the army needs, and not, practically, make our baggage train our general. And, next, we should throw our tents into the bon-fire also: for these again are only a trouble to carry, and do not contribute one grain of good either for fighting or getting provisions. Further, let us get rid of all superfluous baggage, save only what we require for the sake of war, or meat and drink, so that as many of us as possible may be under arms, and as few as possible doing portage. I need not remind you that, in case of defeat, the owners' goods are not their own; but if we master our foes, we will make them our baggage bearers.

“It only rests for me to name the one thing which I look upon as the greatest of all. You see, the enemy did not dare to bring war to bear upon us until they had first seized our generals; they felt that whilst our rulers were there, and we obeyed them, they were no match for us in war; but having got hold of them, they fully expected that the consequent confusion and anarchy would prove fatal to us. What follows? This: Officers and leaders ought to be more vigilant even than their predecessors; subordinates still more orderly and obedient to those in command now than even they were to those who are gone. And you should pass a resolution

¹ Here seems to be the germ—unless, indeed, the thought had been conceived above, p. 54—here at any rate the first conscious expression of the colonisation scheme, of which we shall hear more below, in reference to Cotyora, p. 152; the Phasis, p. 157; Calpe, pp. 180, 183, 190. It appears again fifty years later in the author's pamphlet On Revenues, chapters i. and vi. For the special evils of the fourth century B.C., and the growth of pauperism between B.C. 401 and 338, see Jebb, Attic Orators, vol. i. p. 17.

² Reading τοὺς νῦν οἱ ἀκλήρους πολιτεύοντας ἐνθάδε κομισαμένους πλουσίους ὄραν.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

youngest,¹ will for the present guard the rear. For the rest, we can but make experiment of this arrangement, and alter it with deliberation, as from time to time any improvement suggests itself. If any one has a better plan to propose, let him do so." . . . No dissentient voice was heard. Accordingly he said: "Those in favour of this resolution, hold up their hands." The resolution was carried. "And now," said he, "it would be well to separate and carry out what we have decreed. If any of you has set his heart on seeing his friends again, let him remember to prove himself a man; there is no other way to achieve his heart's wish. Or is mere living an object with any of you, strive to conquer; if to slay is the privilege of victory, to die is the doom of the defeated. Or perhaps to gain money and wealth is your ambition, strive again for mastery; have not conquerors the double gain of keeping what is their own, whilst they seize the possessions of the vanquished?"

III.—The speaking was ended; they got up and retired; then they burnt the wagons and the tents, and after sharing with one another what each needed out of their various superfluities, they threw the remnant into the fire. Having done that, they proceeded to make their breakfasts. While they were breakfasting, Mithridates came with about thirty horsemen, and summoning the generals within earshot, he thus addressed them: "Men of Hellas, I have been faithful to Cyrus, as you know well, and to-day I am your well-wisher; indeed, I am here spending my days in great fear: if then I could see any salutary course in prospect, I should be disposed to join you with all my retainers. Please inform me, then, as to what you propose, regarding me as your friend and well-wisher, anxious only to pursue his march in your company." The generals held council, and resolved to give the following answer, Cheirisophus acting as spokesman: "We have resolved to make our way through the country, inflicting the least possible damage, provided we are allowed a free passage homewards ; but if any one tries to hinder us, he will have to fight it out with us, and we shall bring all the force in our power to bear." Thereat Mithridates set himself to prove to them that their deliverance, except with the king's good pleasure, was hopeless. Then the meaning of his mission was plain. He was an agent in disguise ; in fact, a relation of Tissaphernes was in attendance to keep a check on his loyalty. After that, the generals resolved that it would be better to proclaim open war, without truce or herald, as long as they were in the enemy's country ; for they used to come and corrupt the soldiers, and they were even successful with one officer—Nicarchus,¹ an Arcadian, who went off in the night with about twenty men.

¹ See above, III. i. 14 and 25, pp. 70, 71; and below, III. iv. 42, p. 92; IV. i. 6, ii. 16; V. iii. 1; VII. iii. 46; to which should be added VII. ii. 38; VII. vi. 34; also II. vi. 15, 20, 30. The inference naturally drawn from these and other passages is that Xenophon was a young man at the time of the Anabasis.

After this, they breakfasted and crossed the river Zapatas,² marching in regular order, with the beasts and camp followers in the middle. They had not advanced far on their route when Mithridates made his appearance again, with about a couple of hundred horsemen at his back, and bowmen and slingers twice as many, as nimble fellows as a man might hope to see.³ He approached the Hellenes as if he were friendly ; but when they had got fairly to close quarters, all of a sudden some of them, whether mounted or on foot, began shooting with their bows and arrows, and another set with slings, wounding the men. The rearguard of the Hellenes suffered for a while severely without being able to retaliate, for the Cretans had a shorter range than the Persians, and at the same time, being light-armed troops, they lay cooped up within the ranks of the heavy infantry, while the javelin men again did not shoot far enough to reach the enemy's slingers. This being so, Xenophon thought there was nothing for it but to charge, and charge they did ; some of the heavy and light infantry, who were guarding the rear, with him ; but for all their charging they did not catch a single man.

The dearth of cavalry told against the Hellenes ; nor were their infantry able to overhaul the enemy's infantry, with the long start they had, and considering the shortness of the race, for it was out of the question to pursue them far from the main body of the army. On the other hand, the Asiatic cavalry, even while fleeing, poured volleys of arrows behind their backs, and wounded the pursuers; while the Hellenes must fall back fighting every step of the way they had measured in the pursuit; so that by the end of that day they had not gone much more than three miles; but in the late afternoon they reached the villages.

¹ Can this be the same man whose escape is so graphically described above, p. 60 ?

² Zab.

³ Lit. "very nimble and active."

Here there was a return of the old despondency. Cheirisophus and the eldest of the generals blamed Xenophon for leaving the main body to give chase and endangering himself thereby, while he could not damage the enemy one whit the more. Xenophon admitted that they were right in blaming him: no better proof of that was wanted than the result. "The fact is," he added, "I was driven to pursue; it was too trying to look on and see our men suffer so badly, and be unable to retaliate. However, when we did charge, there is no denying the truth of what you say; we were not a whit more able to injure the enemy, while we had considerable difficulty in beating a retreat ourselves. Thank heaven they did not come upon us in any great force, but were only a handful of men; so that the injury they did us was not large, as it might have been; and at least it has served to show us what we need. At present the enemy shoot and sling beyond our range, so that our Cretan archers are no match for them; our hand-throwers cannot reach as far; and when we pursue, it is not possible to push the pursuit to any great distance from the main body, and within the short distance no foot-soldier, however fleet of foot, could overtake another foot-soldier who has a bow-shot the start of him. If, then, we are to exclude them from all possibility of injuring us as we march, we must get slingers as soon as possible and cavalry. I am told there are in the army some Rhodians, most of whom, they say, know how to sling, and their missile will reach even twice as far as the Persian slings (which, on account of their being loaded with stones as big as one's fist, have a comparatively short range; but the Rhodians are skilled in the use of leaden bullets).¹ Suppose,

¹ These words sound to me like an author's note, parenthetically, and perhaps inadvertently, inserted into the text. It is an "aside" to the reader, which in a modern book would appear as a footnote. See the Cyrop. for many similar remarks "aside."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

pursuit with confidence, as a considerable support was in their rear. So, when Mithridates had come up with them, and they were well within arrow and sling shot, the bugle sounded the signal to the Hellenes ; and immediately the detachment under orders rushed to close quarters, and the cavalry charged. There the enemy preferred not to wait, but fled towards the ravine. In this pursuit the Asiatics lost several of their infantry killed, and of their cavalry as many as eighteen were taken prisoners in the ravine. As to those who were slain the Hellenes, acting upon impulse,¹ mutilated their bodies, by way of impressing their enemy with as frightful an image as possible.

So fared the foe and so fell back ; but the Hellenes, continuing their march in safety for the rest of that day, reached the river Tigris. Here they came upon a large deserted city, the name of which was Larissa :² a place inhabited by the Medes in days of old ; the breadth of its walls was twenty-five feet, and the height of them a hundred, and the circuit of the whole two parasangs. It was built of clay-bricks, supported on a stone basis twenty feet high. This city the king of the Persians³ besieged, what time the Persians strove to snatch their empire from the Medes, but he could in no wise take it ; then a cloud hid the face of the sun and blotted out the light thereof, until the inhabitants were gone out of the city, and so it was taken. By the side of this city there was a stone pyramid in breadth a hundred feet, and in height two hundred feet ; in it were many of the barbarians who had fled for refuge from the neighbouring villages.

From this place they marched one stage of six parasangs to a great deserted fortress [which lay over against the city], and the name of that city was Mespila.⁴ The Medes once

¹ Lit. "self bidden."

² Larissa, on the site of the modern Nimrud (the south-west corner, as is commonly supposed, of Nineveh). See Goodwin and White ad loc. The name is said to mean "citadel," and is given to various Greek cities (of which several occur in Xenophon—in Thessaly, Hell. VI. iv. 34 ; in the Troad, Hell. III. i. 13 ; and in the Aeolid, Hell. III. i. 7 ; and cf. Cyrop. VIII. i. 45), and to the citadel of Argos. See Mr. Tozer, Geog. of Greece, p. 379. "Pelagic names."
³ I.e. Cyrus the Great.

⁴ Opposite Mosul, the north-west portion of the ancient Nineveh, about eighteen miles above Larissa. The circuit of Nineveh is said to have been about fifty-six miles. It was overthrown by Cyrus in B.C. 558. Diod. ii. 3.

dwelt in it. The basement was made of polished stone full of shells; fifty feet was the breadth of it, and fifty feet the height; and on this basement was reared a wall of brick, the breadth whereof was fifty feet and the height thereof four hundred; and the circuit of the wall was six parasangs. Hither, as the story goes, Medea,¹ the king's wife, betook herself in flight what time the Medes lost their empire at the hands of the Persians. To this city also the king of the Persians laid siege, but could not take it either by length of days or strength of hand. But Zeus sent amazement² on the inhabitants thereof, and so it was taken.

From this place they marched one stage,—four parasangs. But, while still on this stage, Tissaphernes made his appearance. He had with him his own cavalry and a force belonging to Orontas, who had the king's daughter to wife; and there were, moreover, with them the Asiatics whom Cyrus had taken with him on his march up; together with those whom the king's brother had brought as a reinforcement to the king; besides those whom Tissaphernes himself had received as a gift from the king, so that the armament appeared to be very great. When they were close, he halted some of his regiments at the rear and wheeled others into position on either flank, but hesitated to attack, having no mind apparently to run any risks, and contenting himself with an order to his slingers to sling and his archers to shoot. But when the Rhodian slingers and the bowmen,³ posted at intervals, retaliated, and every shot told (for with the utmost pains to miss it would have been hard to do so under the circumstances), then Tissaphernes with all speed retired out of range, the other regiments following suit; and for the rest of the day the one party advanced and the other followed. But now the Asiatics had ceased to be dangerous with their sharpshooting. For the

¹ The wife of Astyages, the last king of Media. Some think "the wall of Media" (above, pp. 25, 50) should be "Medea's wall," constructed in the period of Queen Nitocris, B.C. 560.

² Reading ἐμβροντήτους ποιεῖ; or with Hug, βροντῇ κατέπληξε, "With thunder affrighted."

³ The best MSS. read Σκύθαι, Scythians; if this is correct, it is only the technical name for "archers." Cf. Arrian, Tact. ii. 13. The police at Athens were technically so called, as being composed of Scythian slaves. Cf. Aristoph. Thesm. 1017.

Rhodians could reach further than the Persian slingers, or, indeed, than most of the bowmen. The Persian bows are of great size, so that the Cretans found the arrows which were picked up serviceable, and persevered in using their enemies' arrows, and practised shooting with them, letting them fly upwards to a great height.¹ There were also plenty of bowstrings found in the villages—and lead, which they turned to account for their slings. As the result of this day, then, the Hellenes chancing upon some villages had no sooner encamped than the barbarians fell back, having had distinctly the worst of it in the skirmishing.

The next was a day of inaction: they halted and took in supplies, as there was much corn in the villages; but on the day following, the march was continued through the plain (of the Tigris), and Tissaphernes still hung on their skirts with his skirmishers. And now it was that the Hellenes discovered the defect of marching in a square with an enemy following. As a matter of necessity, whenever the wings of an army so disposed draw together, either where a road narrows, or hills close in, or a bridge has to be crossed, the heavy infantry cannot help being squeezed out of their ranks, and march with difficulty, partly from actual pressure, and partly from the general confusion that ensues; and once thrown into disorder that arm is practically useless. Or, supposing the wings are again extended, the troops have hardly recovered from their former distress before they are pulled asunder, and there is a wide space between the wings, and the men concerned lose confidence in themselves, especially with an enemy close behind. What happened, when a bridge had to be crossed or other passage effected, was, that each unit of the force pressed on in anxiety to get over first, and at these moments it was easy for the enemy to make an attack. The generals accordingly, having recognised the defect, set about curing it. To do so, they made six lochi, or divisions of a hundred men apiece, each of which had its own set of captains and under-officers in ¹ I.e., in practising, in order to get the maximum range they let fly the arrows, not horizontally, but up into the air. Sir W. Raleigh (Hist. of the World, III. x. 8) says that Xenophon "trained his archers to short compass, who had been accustomed to the point blank," but this is surely not Xenophon's meaning. See Mr. Pretor ad loc.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

was altogether useless, huddling in the mob of sutlers, both slingers and archers alike.

But when the Hellenes, being so pressed, made an attempt to pursue, they could barely scale to the summit, being heavy-armed troops, while the enemy as lightly sprung away; and they suffered similarly in retiring to join the rest of the army. And then, on the second hill, the whole had to be gone through again; so that when it came to the third hillock, they determined not to move the main body of troops from their position until they had brought up a division of light infantry¹ from the right flank of the square to a point on the mountain range. When this detachment were once posted above their pursuers, the latter desisted from attacking the main body in its descent, for fear of being cut off and finding themselves between two assailants. Thus the rest of the day they moved on in two divisions: one set keeping to the road by the hillocks, the other marching parallel on the higher level along the mountains; and thus they reached the villages and appointed eight surgeons² to attend to the many wounded.

Here they halted three days for the sake of the wounded chiefly, while a further inducement was the plentiful supply of provisions which they found, wheat and wine, and large stores of barley laid up for horses. These supplies had been collected by³ the ruling satrap of the country. On the fourth day they began their descent into the plain; but when Tissaphernes with his force overtook them, necessity taught them to camp in the first village they caught sight of, and give over the attempt of marching and fighting simultaneously, as so many were hors de combat, being either on the list of wounded themselves, or else engaged in carrying the wounded, or laden with the heavy arms of those so occupied. But when they were once encamped, and the barbarians, advancing upon the village, made an attempt to harass them with their sharpshooters, the superiority of the Hellenes was pronounced. To sustain a running fight with an enemy constantly attacking was one thing; to keep him at arm's length from a fixed base of action another: and the difference was much in their favour.

¹ These are the "peltasts."

² Cf. Cyrop. I. vi. 15.

³ Or "for."

But when it was late afternoon, the time had come for the enemy to withdraw, since the habit of the barbarian was never to encamp within seven or eight miles¹ of the Hellenic camp. This he did in apprehension of a night attack, for a Persian army is good for nothing at night. Their horses are haltered, and, as a rule, hobbled as well,² to prevent their escaping, as they might if loose ; so that, if any alarm occurs, the trooper has to saddle and bridle his horse, and then he must put on his own cuirass, and then mount—all which performances are difficult at night and in the midst of confusion. For this reason they always encamped at a distance from the Hellenes.

When the Hellenes perceived that they were preparing to retire, and that the order was being given, the herald's cry, "Pack up for starting," might be heard before the enemy was fairly out of earshot. For a while the Asiatics paused, as if unwilling to be gone ; but as night closed in, off they went, for it did not suit their notions of expediency to set off on a march and arrive by night. And now, when the Hellenes saw that they were really and clearly gone, they too broke up their camp and pursued their march till they had traversed seven and a half miles. Thus the distance between the two armies grew to be so great, that the next day the enemy did not appear at all, nor yet the third day ; but on the fourth the barbarians had pushed on by a forced night march and occupied a commanding position on the right, where the Hellenes had to pass. It was a narrow mountain spur³ overhanging the descent into the plain.

But when Cheirisophus saw that this ridge was occupied, he summoned Xenophon from the rear, bidding him at the same time to bring up the peltasts to the front. That Xenophon hesitated to do, for Tissaphernes and his whole army were coming up and were well within sight. Galloping up to the front himself, he asked : "Why do you summon me ?" The other answered him : "The reason is plain ; look yonder ; this crest which overhangs our descent has been occupied. There is no passing, until we have dislodged these fellows ; why have you not brought up the light infantry ? ” Xenophon explained : —he had not thought it desirable to leave the rear unprotected, with an enemy appearing in the field of view. “ However, it is time,” he added, “ to decide how we are to dislodge these fellows from the crest.” At this moment his eye fell on the peak of the mountain, rising immediately above their army, and he could see an approach leading from it to the crest in question where the enemy lay. He exclaimed : “ The best thing we can do, Cheirisophus, is to make a dash at the height itself, and with what speed we may. If we take it, the party in command of the road will never be able to stop. If you like, stay in command of the army, and I will go ; or, if you prefer, do you go at the mountain, and I will stay here.” —“ I leave it to you,” Cheirisophus answered, “ to choose which you like best.” Xenophon remarking, “ I am the younger,” elected to go ; but he stipulated for a detachment from the front to accompany him, since it was a long way to fetch up troops from the rear. Accordingly Cheirisophus furnished him with the light infantry from the front, reoccupying their place by those from the centre. He also gave him, to form part of the detachment, the three hundred of the picked corps¹ under his own command at the head of the square.

¹ Lit. Within 60 stades = 7½ English miles.

² Cf. Cyrop. V. iii. 43 ; and also for similar Thracian methods, below, p. 205.

³ Lit. "a mere nail tip."

They set out from the low ground with all the haste imaginable. But the enemy in position on the crest no sooner perceived their advance upon the summit of the pass than they themselves set off full tilt in a rival race for the summit too. Hoarse were the shouts from the Hellenic troops as the men cheered their companions forwards, and hoarse the answering shout from the troops of Tissaphernes, urging on theirs. Xenophon, mounted on his charger, rode beside his men, and roused their ardour the while. “ Now for it, brave sirs ; bethink you that the race is for Hellas !—now or never !—to find your boys, your wives ; one small effort, and the rest of the march we shall pursue in peace, without ever a blow to strike ; now for it.” But Soteridas the Sicyonian said : “ We ¹ Some think that these three hundred are three of the detached companies described above, p. 88 ; others, that they were a picked corps in attendance on the commander-in-chief, οἱ ἐπιλεκτοί. Cf. Xen. Hell. V. iii. 23 et passim.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

latter rode along the ranks as the rescuing party came up, and greeted them thus: "Do you not see, men of Hellas, they admit that the country is now ours; what they stipulated against our doing when they made the treaty, viz. that we were not to fire the king's country, they are now themselves doing,—setting fire to it as if it were not their own. But we will be even with them; if they leave provisions for themselves anywhere, there also shall they see us marching;" and, turning to Cheirisophus, he added: "But it strikes me, we should sally forth against these incendiaries and protect our country." Cheirisophus retorted: "That is not quite my view; I say, let us do a little burning ourselves, and they will cease all the quicker."

When they had got back to the villages, while the rest were busy about provisions, the generals and officers met: and here there was deep despondency. For on the one side were exceedingly high mountains; on the other a river of such depth that they failed to reach the bottom with their spears. In the midst of their perplexities, a Rhodian came up with a proposal, as follows: "I am ready, sirs, to carry you across, four thousand heavy infantry at a time; if you will furnish me with what I need and give me a talent¹ into the bargain for my pains." When asked, "What shall you need?" he replied: "Two thousand wine-skins. I see there are plenty of sheep and goats, oxen and asses. They have only to be flayed, and their skins inflated, and they will readily give us a passage. I shall want also the straps which you use for the baggage animals. With these I shall couple the skins to one another; then I shall moor each skin by attaching stones and letting them down like anchors into the water. Then I shall carry them across, and when I have fastened the links at both ends, I shall place layers of wood on them and a coating of earth on the top of that. You will see in a minute that there's no danger of your drowning, for every skin will be able to support a couple of men without sinking, and the wood and earth will prevent your slipping off."

The generals thought it a pretty invention enough, but its realisation impracticable, for on the other side were masses of cavalry posted and ready to bar the passage; who, to begin with, would not suffer the first detachment of crossers to carry out any item of the programme.

¹ Or, £250 (the talent = £243 : 155).

Under these circumstances, the next day they turned right about face, and began retracing their steps in the direction of Babylon to the unburnt villages, having previously set fire to those they left, so that the enemy did not ride up to them, but stood and stared, all agape to see¹ in what direction the Hellenes would betake themselves and what they were minded to do. Here, again, while the rest of the soldiers were busy about provisions, the generals and officers met in council, and after collecting the prisoners together, submitted them to a cross-examination touching the whole country round, the names, and so forth, of each district.

The prisoners informed them that the regions south, through which they had come, belonged to the district towards Babylon and Media ; the road east led to Susa and Ecbatana, where the king is said to spend summer and spring ; crossing the river, the road west led to Lydia and Ionia ; and the part through the mountains facing towards the Great Bear, led, they said, to the Carduchians.² They were a people, so said the prisoners, dwelling up on the hills, addicted to war, and not subject to the king ; so much so that once, when a royal army one hundred and twenty thousand strong had invaded them, not a man came back, owing to the intricacies of the country. Occasionally, however, they made truce or treaty with the satrap in the plain, and, for the nonce, there would be intercourse : “ they will come in and out amongst us,” “ and we will go in and out amongst them,” said the captives.

¹ Reading either ὅμοιοι ἦσαν θαυμάζειν with Sauppe ; or, ὅμοιοι ἦσαν θαυμάζουσιν With Hug.

² See Dr. Kiepert, Man. Anc. Geog. (Eng. Tr., Macmillan) iv. 47. The Karduchians or Kurds belong by speech to the Iranian stock, forming in fact their farthest outpost to the West, little given to agriculture, but chiefly to the breeding of cattle. Their name, pronounced Kardu by the ancient Syrians and Assyrians, Kordu by the Armenians (plural Kordukh), first appears in its narrower sense in Western literature in the pages of the eye-witness Xenophon as Καρδοῦχοι. Later writers knew of a small kingdom here at the time of the Roman occupation, ruled by native princes, who after Tigranes II. (about 80 B.C.) recognised the overlordship of the Armenian king. Later it became a province of the Sassanid kingdom, and as such was in 297 A.D. handed over among the regiones transtigritanae to the Roman empire, but in 364 was again ceded to Persia.

After hearing these statements, the generals seated apart those who claimed to have any special knowledge of the country in any direction; they put them to sit apart without making it clear which particular route they intended to take. Finally the resolution to which they came was that they must force a passage through the hills into the territory of the Kurds; since, according to what their informants told them, when they had once passed these, they would find themselves in Armenia—the rich and large territory governed by Orontas; and from Armenia, it would be easy to proceed in any direction whatever. Thereupon they offered sacrifice, so as to be ready to start on the march as soon as the right moment appeared to have arrived. Their chief fear was that the high pass over the mountains might be occupied in advance: and a general order was issued, that after supper every one should get his kit together for starting, and repose, in readiness to follow as soon as the word of command was given.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

summit without any of the enemy perceiving him. Then he led on slowly, and the rest of the army followed, wave upon wave, cresting the summit and descending into the villages which nestled in the hollows and recesses of the hills.

Thereupon the Carduchians abandoned their dwelling-places, and with their wives and children fled to the mountains ; so there was plenty of provisions to be got for the mere trouble of taking, and the homesteads too were well supplied with a copious store of bronze vessels and utensils which the Hellenes kept their hands off, abstaining at the same time from all pursuit of the folk themselves, gently handling them,¹ in hopes that the Carduchians might be willing to give them friendly passage through their country, since they too were enemies of the king : only they helped themselves to such provisions as fell in their way, which indeed was a sheer necessity. But the Carduchians neither gave ear, when they called to them, nor showed any other friendly sign ; and now, as the last of the Hellenes descended into the villages from the pass, they were already in the dark, since, owing to the narrowness of the road, the whole day had been spent in the ascent and descent. At that instant a party of the Carduchians, who had collected, made an attack on the hindmost men, killing some and wounding others with stones and arrows—though it was quite a small body who attacked. The fact was, the approach of the Hellenic army had taken them by surprise ; if, however, they had mustered in larger force at this time, the chances are that a large portion of the army would have been annihilated. As it was, they got into quarters, and bivouacked in the villages that night, while the Carduchians kept many watch-fires blazing in a circle on the mountains, and kept each other in sight all round.

But with the dawn the generals and officers of the Hellenes met and resolved to proceed, taking only the necessary number of stout baggage animals, and leaving the weaklings behind. They resolved further to let go free all the lately-captured slaves in the host ; for the pace of the march was necessarily rendered slow by the quantity of animals and prisoners, and the number of non-combatants in attendance on these was excessive, while, with such a crowd of human beings to satisfy,¹ twice the amount of provisions had to be procured and carried. These resolutions passed, they caused a proclamation by herald to be made for their enforcement.

¹ Lit. "sparing them a little."

When they had breakfasted and the march recommenced, the generals planted themselves a little to one side in a narrow place, and when they found any of the aforesaid slaves or other property still retained, they confiscated them. The soldiers yielded obedience, except where some smuggler, prompted by desire of a good-looking boy or woman, managed to make off with his prize. During this day they contrived to get along after a fashion, now fighting and now resting. But on the next day they were visited by a great storm, in spite of which they were obliged to continue the march, owing to insufficiency of provisions. Cheirisophus was as usual leading in front, while Xenophon headed the rearguard, when the enemy began a violent and sustained attack. At one narrow place after another they came up quite close, pouring in volleys of arrows and slingstones, so that the Hellenes had no choice but to make sallies in pursuit and then again recoil, making but very little progress. Over and over again Xenophon would send an order to the front to slacken pace, when the enemy were pressing their attack severely. As a rule, when the word was so passed up, Cheirisophus slackened; but sometimes² instead of slackening, Cheirisophus quickened, sending down a counter-order to the rear to follow on quickly. It was clear that there was something or other happening, but there was no time to go to the front and discover the cause of the hurry. Under these circumstances the march, at any rate in the rear, became very like a rout, and here a brave man lost his life, Cleonymus the Laconian, shot with an arrow in the ribs right through shield and corselet, as also Basias, an Arcadian, shot clean through the head.

As soon as they reached a halting-place, Xenophon, without more ado, came up to Cheirisophus, and took him to task for not having waited, "whereby," said he, "we were forced to fight and flee at the same moment ; and now it has cost us the lives of two fine fellows ;¹ they are dead, and we were not able to pick up their bodies or bury them." Cheirisophus answered : " Look up there," pointing as he spoke to the mountain, " do you see how inaccessible it all is ? only this one road, which you see, going straight up, and on it all that crowd of men who have seized and are guarding the single exit. That is why I hastened on, and why I could not wait for you, hoping to be beforehand with them yonder in seizing the pass : the guides we have got say there is no other way." And Xenophon replied : " But I have got two prisoners also ; the enemy annoyed us so much that we laid an ambuscade for them, which also gave us time to recover our breaths ; we killed some of them, and did our best to catch one or two alive—for this very reason—that we might have guides who knew the country, to depend upon."

¹ Or, "so many mouths to feed."

² Or, "on one occasion."

The two were brought up at once and questioned separately : " Did they know of any other road than the one visible ? " The first said no ; and in spite of all sorts of terrors applied to extract a better answer—no, he persisted. When nothing could be got out of him, he was killed before the eyes of his fellow. This latter then explained : " Yonder man said, he did not know, because he has got a daughter married to a husband in those parts. I can take you," he added, " by a good road, practicable even for beasts." And when asked whether there was any point on it difficult to pass, he replied that there was a col which it would be impossible to pass unless it were occupied in advance.

Then it was resolved to summon the officers of the light infantry and some of those of the heavy infantry, and to acquaint them with the state of affairs, and ask them whether any of them were minded to distinguish themselves, and would step forward as volunteers on an expedition. Two or three heavy infantry soldiers stepped forward at once—two Arcadians, Aristonymus of Methydrium, and Agasias of Stymphalus—and in emulation of these, a third, also an Arcadian, Callimachus from Parrhasia, who said he was ready to go, and would get volun-

¹ Or, " good men and true " ; lit. " two beautiful and brave men." Cf. Ital. " galantuomini."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

not, for above them lay a breast-like hill¹ skirted by the narrow road on which they had found the guards seated. Still, from the spot in question there was an approach to the enemy, who were seated on the pass before mentioned.

Here then they passed the night, but at the first glimpse of dawn they marched stealthily and in battle order against the enemy. There was a mist, so that they could get quite close without being observed. But as soon as they caught sight of one another, the trumpet sounded, and with a loud cheer they rushed upon the fellows, who did not wait their coming, but left the road and made off; with the loss of only a few lives however, so nimble were they. Cheirisophus and his men, catching the sound of the bugle, charged up by the well-marked road, while others of the generals pushed their way up by pathless routes, where each division chanced to be; the men mounting as they were best able, and hoisting one another up by means of their spears; and these were the first to unite with the party who had already taken the position by storm. Xenophon, with the rearguard, followed the path which the party with the guide had taken, since it was easiest for the beasts of burthen; one half of his men he had posted in rear of the baggage animals; the other half he had with himself. In their course they encountered a crest above the road, occupied by the enemy, whom they must either dislodge or be themselves cut off from the rest of the Hellenes. The men by themselves could have taken the same route as the rest, but the baggage animals could not mount by any other way than this.

Here then, with shouts of encouragement to each other, they dashed at the hill with their storming columns,² not from all sides, but leaving an avenue of escape for the enemy, if he chose to avail himself of it. For a while, as the men scrambled up where each best could, the natives kept up a fire of arrows and darts, yet did not receive them at close quarters, but presently left the position in flight. No sooner, however, were the Hellenes safely past this crest, than they came in sight of another in front of them, also occupied, and deemed it advisable to storm it also. But now it struck Xenophon that if they left the ridge just taken unprotected in their rear, the enemy might re-occupy it and attack the baggage animals as they filed past, presenting a long extended line owing to the narrowness of the road by which they made their way. To obviate this, he left some officers in charge of the ridge—Cephisodorus, son of Cephisophon, an Athenian ; Amphicrates, the son of Amphidemus, an Athenian ; and Archagoras, an Argive exile—while he in person with the rest of the men attacked the second ridge ; this they took in the same fashion, only to find that they had still a third knoll left, far the steepest of the three. This was none other than the mamelon mentioned as above the outpost, which had been captured over their fire by the volunteer storming party in the night. But when the Hellenes were close, the natives, to the astonishment of all, without a struggle deserted the knoll. It was conjectured that they had left their position from fear of being encircled and besieged, but the fact was that they, from their higher ground, had been able to see what was going on in the rear, and had all made off in this fashion to attack the rearguard.

¹ Or, "mamelon."

² ἀφθλοῖς τοῖς λόχοις. See below IV. viii. 9-19; V. iv. 22.

So then Xenophon, with the youngest men, scaled up to the top, leaving orders to the rest to march on slowly, so as to allow the hindmost companies to unite with them ; they were to advance by the road, and when they reached the level to ground arms.¹ Meanwhile the Argive Archagoras arrived, in full flight, with the announcement that they had been dislodged from the first ridge, and that Cephisodorus and Amphicrates were slain, with a number of others besides, all in fact who had not jumped down the crags and so reached the rearguard. After this achievement the barbarians came to a crest facing the mamelon, and Xenophon held a colloquy with them by means of an interpreter, to negotiate a truce, and demanded back the dead bodies. These they agreed to restore if he would not burn their houses, and to these terms Xenophon agreed. Meanwhile, as the rest of the army filed past, and the colloquy was proceeding, all the people of the place had time to gather gradually, and the enemy formed ; and as soon as the Hellenes began to descend from the mamelon to join the others where the troops were halted, on rushed the foe, in full force, with hue and cry. They reached the summit of the mamelon from which Xenophon was descending, and began rolling down crags. One man's leg was crushed to pieces. Xenophon was left by his shield-bearer, who carried off his shield, but Eurylochus of Lusian,¹ an Arcadian hoplite, ran up to him, and threw his shield in front to protect both of them; so the two together beat a retreat, and so too the rest, and joined the serried ranks of the main body.

¹ To take up position.

After this the whole Hellenic force united, and took up their quarters there in numerous beautiful dwellings, with an ample store of provisions, for there was wine so plentiful that they had it in cemented cisterns. Xenophon and Cheirisophus arranged to recover the dead, and in return restored the guide; afterwards they did everything for the dead, according to the means at their disposal, with the customary honours paid to good men.²

Next day they set off without a guide; and the enemy, by keeping up a continuous battle and occupying in advance every narrow place, obstructed passage after passage. Accordingly, whenever the van was obstructed, Xenophon, from behind, made a dash up the hills and broke the barricade, and freed the vanguard by endeavouring to get above the obstructing enemy. Whenever the rear was the point attacked, Cheirisophus, in the same way, made a détour, and by endeavouring to mount higher than the barricaders, freed the passage for the rear rank; and in this way, turn and turn about, they rescued each other, and paid unflinching attention to their mutual needs. At times it happened that, the relief party having mounted, encountered considerable annoyance in their descent from the barbarians, who were so agile that they allowed them to come up quite close, before they turned back, and still escaped, partly no doubt because the only weapons they had to carry were bows and slings.

They were, moreover, excellent archers, using bows nearly three cubits long and arrows more than two cubits. When discharging the arrow, they draw the string by getting a purchase with the

¹ i.e. of Lusi (or Lusian), a town (or district) in Northern Arcadia.

² Or, "brave men," ἀνδράσι ἀγαθοῖς.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

to cross, but on their making the attempt the water proved to be more than breast-deep, and the river bed was rough with great slippery stones, and as to holding their arms in the water, it was out of the question—the stream swept them away—or if they tried to carry them over the head, the body was left exposed to the arrows and other missiles; accordingly they turned back and encamped there by the bank of the river.

At the point where they had themselves been last night, up on the mountains, they could see the Carduchians collected in large numbers and under arms. A shadow of deep despair again descended on their souls, whichever way they turned their eyes—in front lay the river so difficult to ford; over, on the other side, a new enemy threatening to bar the passage; on the hills behind, the Carduchians ready to fall upon their rear should they once again attempt to cross. Thus for this day and night they halted, sunk in perplexity. But Xenophon had a dream. In his sleep he thought that he was bound in fetters, but these, of their own accord, fell from off him, so that he was loosed, and could stretch his legs as freely as he wished.¹ So at the first glimpse of daylight he came to Cheirisophus and told him that he had hopes that all things would go well, and related to him his dream.

The other was well pleased, and with the first faint gleam of dawn the generals all were present and did sacrifice; and the victims were favourable at the first essay. Retiring from the sacrifice, the generals and officers issued an order to the troops to take their breakfasts; and while Xenophon was taking his, two young men came running up to him, for every one knew that, breakfasting or supping, he was always accessible, or that even if asleep any one was welcome to awaken him who had anything to say bearing on the business of war. What the two young men had at this time to say was that they had been collecting brushwood for fire, and had presently espied on the opposite side, in among some rocks which came down to the river's brink, an old man and some women and little girls depositing, as it would appear, bags of clothes in a cavernous rock. When they saw them, it struck them that it was safe to cross ; in any case¹ the enemy's cavalry could not approach at this point. So they stripped naked, expecting to have to swim for it, and with their long knives in their hands began crossing, but going forward crossed without being wet up to the fork. Once across they captured the clothes, and came back again.

¹ It is impossible to give the true sense and humour of the passage in English, depending, as it does, on the double meaning of διαβαλεῖν (1) to cross (a river), (2) to stride or straddle (of the legs). The army is unable (διαβαλεῖν) to cross the Centrites; Xenophon dreams that he is fettered, but the chains drop off his legs and he is able (διαβαλεῖν) to stride as freely as ever; next morning the two young men come to him with the story how they had found themselves able (διαβαλεῖν) to walk across the river instead of having to swim it. It is obvious to Xenophon that the dream is sent from Heaven. See above, p. 69.

Accordingly Xenophon at once poured out a libation himself, and bade the two young fellows fill the cup and pray to the gods, who showed to him this vision and to them a passage, to bring all other blessings for them to accomplishment. When he had poured out the libations, he at once led the two young men to Cheirisophus, and they repeated to him their story. Cheirisophus, on hearing it, offered libations also, and when they had performed them, they sent a general order to the troops to pack up ready for starting, while they themselves called a meeting of the generals and took counsel how they might best effect a passage, so as to overpower the enemy in front without suffering any loss from the men behind. And they resolved that Cheirisophus should lead the van and cross with half the army, the other half still remaining behind under Xenophon, while the baggage animals and the mob of sutlers were to cross between the two divisions.

When all was duly ordered the move began, the young men pioneering them, and keeping the river on their left. It was about four furlongs' march to the crossing, and as they moved along the bank, the squadrons of cavalry kept pace with them on the opposite side.

But when they had reached a point in a line with the ford, and the cliff-like banks of the river, they ordered arms,² and first Cheirisophus himself placed a wreath upon his brows,³ and throwing off his cloak,¹ resumed his arms, passing the order to all the rest to do the same, and bade the captains form their companies in open order in deep columns, some to left and some to right of himself. Meanwhile the soothsayers were slaying a victim over the river, and the enemy were letting fly their arrows and slingstones; but as yet they were out of range. As soon as the victims were favourable, all the soldiers began singing the battle hymn, and with the notes of the pæan mingled the shouting of the men² accompanied by the shriller chant of the women, for there were many women³ in the camp.

¹ Lit. "for not even."

² Took up position.

³ Cf. Pol. Lac. xiii. 8 ; Hell. IV. iii. 21.

So Cheirisophus with his detachment stepped in. But Xenophon, taking the most active-bodied of the rearguard, began running back at full speed to the passage facing the egress into the hills of Armenia, making a feint of crossing at that point to intercept their cavalry on the river bank. The enemy, seeing Cheirisophus's detachment easily crossing the stream, and Xenophon's men racing back, were seized with the fear of being intercepted, and fled at full speed in the direction of the road which emerges from the stream. But when they were come opposite to it they raced up hill towards their mountains. Then Lycius, who commanded the cavalry, and Aeschines, who was in command of the division of light infantry attached to Cheirisophus, no sooner saw them fleeing so lustily than they were after them, and the soldiers shouted not to fall behind,⁴ but to follow them right up to the mountains. Cheirisophus, on getting across, forbore to pursue the cavalry, but advanced by the bluffs which reached to the river to attack the enemy overhead. And these, seeing their own cavalry fleeing, seeing also the heavy infantry advancing upon them, abandoned the heights above the river.

¹ Or, "having doffed it," i.e. the wreath, an action which the soldiers would perform symbolically, if Grote is right in his interpretation of the passage, Hist. of Greece, vol. ix. p. 137.

² The Greek words ἀνῆλάλαζον, συνωλόλυζον, of the men and women respectively = "shouted Alala," and raised the joyous ὀλολυγή or chant of invocation. Cf. Hom. H. Ven. 19.

³ Lit. "comrade-women" (ἑταῖραι, hetærae).

⁴ Or, "to stick tight to them and not to be outdone"; or, as others understand, "the (infantry) soldiers clamoured not to be left behind, but to follow them up into the mountains." See Mr. Pretor ad loc.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

merest handful (for many even of those whose duty it was to remain had gone off in their anxiety to protect their beasts of burden, or their personal kit, or their mistresses), bore down upon them valorously, and opened fire with slingstones and arrows. But the Hellenes, raising the battle hymn, dashed at them at a run, and they did not await them; armed well enough for mountain warfare, and with a view to sudden attack followed by speedy flight, they were not by any means sufficiently equipped for an engagement at close quarters. At this instant the signal of the bugle was heard. Its notes added wings to the flight of the barbarians, but the Hellenes turned right about in the opposite direction, and betook themselves to the river with what speed they might. Some of the enemy, here a man and there another, perceived, and running back to the river, let fly their arrows and wounded a few; but the majority, even when the Hellenes were well across, were still to be seen pursuing their flight. The detachment which came to meet Xenophon's men, carried away by their valour, advanced further than they had need to, and had to cross back again in the rear of Xenophon's men, and of these too a few were wounded.

iv.—The passage effected, they fell into line about mid-day, and marched through Armenian territory, one long plain with smooth rolling hillocks, not less than five parasangs in distance; for owing to the wars of this people with the Car-duchians there were no villages near the river. The village eventually reached was large, and possessed a palace belonging to the satrap, and most of the houses were crowned with turrets; provisions were plentiful.

From this village they marched two stages—ten parasangs—until they had surmounted the sources of the river Tigris; and from this point they marched three stages—fifteen parasangs—to the river Teleboas. This was a fine stream, though not large, and there were many villages about it. The district was named Western Armenia. The lieutenant-governor of it was Tiribazus, the king's friend, and whenever the latter paid a visit, he alone had the privilege of mounting the king upon his horse. This officer rode up to the Hellenes with a body of cavalry, and sending forward an interpreter, stated that he desired a colloquy with the leaders. The generals resolved to hear what he had to say; and advancing on their side to within speaking distance, they demanded what he wanted. He replied that he wished to make a treaty with them, in accordance with which he on his side would abstain from injuring the Hellenes, if they would not burn his houses, but merely take such provisions as they needed. This proposal satisfied the generals, and a treaty was made on the terms suggested.

From this place they marched three stages—fifteen parasangs—through plain country, Tiribazus the while keeping close behind with his own forces more than a mile off. Presently they reached a palace with villages clustered round about it, which were full of supplies in great variety. But while they were encamping in the night there was a heavy fall of snow, and in the morning it was resolved to billet out the different regiments, with their generals, throughout the villages. There was no enemy in sight, and the proceeding seemed prudent, owing to the quantity of snow. In these quarters they had for provisions all the good things there are—sacrificial beasts, corn, old wines with an exquisite bouquet, dried grapes, and vegetables of all sorts. But some of the stragglers from the camp reported having seen an army, and the blaze of many watchfires in the night. Accordingly the generals concluded that it was not prudent to separate their quarters in this way, and a resolution was passed to bring the troops together again. After that they reunited, the more so that the weather promised to be fine with a clear sky; but while they lay there in open quarters, during the night down came so thick a fall of snow that it completely covered up the stacks of arms and the men themselves lying down. It cramped and crippled the baggage animals; and there was great unreadiness to get up, so gently fell the snow as they lay there warm and comfortable, and formed a blanket, except where it slipped off the sleeper's shoulders; and it was not until Xenophon roused himself to get up, and, without his cloak on,¹ began to split wood, that quickly first one and then another got up, and taking the log away from him, fell to splitting. Thereat the rest followed suit, got up, and began kindling fires and oiling their bodies, for there was a scented unguent to be found there in abundance, which they used instead of oil. It was made from pig's fat, sesame, bitter almonds, and turpentine. There was a sweet oil also to be found, made of the same ingredients.

¹ Or, as we should say, "in his shirt sleeves." Doubtless he lay with his ἰμάτιον or cloak loosely wrapped round him; as he sprang to his feet he would throw it off, or it would fall off, and with the simple inner covering of the

After this it was resolved that they must again separate their quarters and get under cover in the villages. At this news the soldiers, with much joy and shouting, rushed upon the covered houses and the provisions; but all who in their blind folly had set fire to the houses when they left them before, now paid the penalty in the poor quarters they got. From this place one night they sent off a party under Democrates, a Temenite,¹ up into the mountains, where the stragglers reported having seen watchfires. The leader selected was a man whose judgment might be depended upon to verify the truth of the matter. With a happy gift to distinguish between fact and fiction, he had often been successfully appealed to. He went and reported that he had seen no watchfires, but he had got a man, whom he brought back with him, carrying a Persian bow and quiver, and a sagaris or battleaxe² like those worn by the Amazons. When asked "from what country he came," the prisoner answered that he was "a Persian, and was going from the army of Tiribazus to get provisions." They next asked him "how large the army was, and for what object it had been collected." His answer was that "it consisted of Tiribazus at the head of his own forces, and aided by some Chalybian and Taochian mercenaries. Tiribazus had got it together," he added, "meaning to attack the Hellenes on the high mountain pass, in a defile which was the sole passage."

When the generals heard this news, they resolved to collect the troops, and they set off at once, taking the prisoner to act as guide, and leaving a garrison behind with Sophaenetes the χιτών to protect him, and arms free, he fell to chopping the wood, only half clad.

¹ Reading Τεμενίτην, i.e. a native of Temenus, a district of Syracuse; al. Τημενίτην, i.e. from Temnus in the Aeolid; al. Τημενίτην, i.e. from Temenum in the Argolid.

² Or, "bill."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

had arrived a good while and had kindled fires were not for allowing these late-comers near their fires, unless they would in return give a share of their corn or of any other victuals they might have. Here then a general exchange of goods was set up. Where the fire was kindled the snow melted, and great trenches formed themselves down to the bare earth, and here it was possible to measure the depth of the snow.

Leaving these quarters, they marched the whole of the next day over snow, and many of the men were afflicted with "boulimia" (or hunger-faintness). Xenophon, who was guarding the rear, came upon some men who had dropt down, and he did not know what ailed them; but some one who was experienced in such matters suggested to him that they had evidently got boulimia; and if they got something to eat, they would revive. Then he went the round of the baggage train, and laying an embargo on any eatables he could see, doled out with his own hands, or sent off other able-bodied agents to distribute to the sufferers, who as soon as they had taken a mouthful got on their legs again and continued the march.

On and on they marched, and about dusk Cheirisophus reached a village, and surprised some women and girls who had come from the village to fetch water at the fountain outside the stockade. These asked them who they were. The interpreters answered for them in Persian: "They were on their way from the king to the satrap;" in reply to which the women gave them to understand that the satrap was not at home, but was away a parasang farther on. As it was late they entered with the water-carriers within the stockade to visit the headman of the village. Accordingly Cheirisophus and as many of the troops as were able got into cantonments there, while the rest of the soldiers—those namely who were unable to complete the march—had to spend the night out, without food and without fire; under the circumstances some of the men perished.

On the heels of the army hung perpetually bands of the enemy, snatching away disabled baggage animals and fighting with each other over the carcasses. And in its track not seldom were left to their fate disabled soldiers, struck down with snow-blindness or with toes mortified by frostbite. As to the eyes, it was some alleviation against the snow to march with something black before them; for the feet, the only remedy was to keep in motion without stopping for an instant, and to loose the sandal at night. If they went to sleep with the sandals on, the thong worked into the feet, and the sandals were frozen fast to them. This was partly due to the fact that, since their old sandals had failed, they wore untanned brogues made of newly-flayed ox-hides. It was owing to some such dire necessity that a party of men fell out and were left behind, and seeing a black-looking patch of ground where the snow had evidently disappeared, they conjectured it must have been melted; and this was actually so, owing to a spring of some sort which was to be seen steaming up in a dell close by. To this they had turned aside and sat down, and were loth to go a step further. But Xenophon, with his rearguard, perceived them, and begged and implored them by all manner of means not to be left behind, telling them that the enemy were after them in large packs pursuing; and he ended by growing angry. They merely bade him put a knife to their throats; not one step farther would they stir.¹ Then it seemed best to frighten the pursuing enemy if possible, and prevent their falling upon the invalids. It was already dusk, and the pursuers were advancing with much noise and hubbub, wrangling and disputing over their spoils. Then all of a sudden the rearguard, in the plenitude of health and strength,² sprang up out of their lair and ran upon the enemy, whilst those weary wights³ bawled out as loud as their sick throats could sound, and clashed their spears against their shields; and the enemy in terror hurled themselves through the snow into the dell, and not one of them ever uttered a sound again.

Xenophon and his party, telling the sick folk that next day people would come for them, set off, and before they had gone half a mile they fell in with some soldiers who had laid down to rest on the snow with their cloaks wrapped round them, but never a guard was established, and they made them get up. Their explanation was that those in front would not move on. Passing by this group he sent forward the strongest of his light infantry in advance, with orders to find out what the stoppage was. They reported that the whole army lay reposing in the same fashion. That being so, Xenophon's men had nothing for it but to bivouac in the open air also, without fire and supperless, merely posting what pickets they could under the circumstances. But as soon as it drew towards day, Xenophon despatched the youngest of his men to the sick folk behind, with orders to make them get up and force them to proceed. Meanwhile Cheirisophus had sent some of his men quartered in the village to enquire how they fared in the rear ; they were overjoyed to see them, and handed over the sick folk to them to carry into camp, while they themselves continued their march forwards, and ere twenty furlongs were past reached the village in which Cheirisophus was quartered. As soon as the two divisions were met, the resolution was come to that it would be safe to billet the regiments throughout the villages ; Cheirisophus remained where he was, while the rest drew lots for the villages in sight, and then, with their several detachments, marched off to their respective destinations.

¹ Or, "for it was impossible for them to go a step farther."

² Hug, after Rehdantz, Would omit the Words ἄνδρες ἰσχυροὶ = "in the plenitude of health and strength."

³ Or, "the invalids."

It was here that Polycrates, an Athenian and captain of a company, asked for leave of absence—he wished to be off on a quest of his own ; and putting himself at the head of the active men of the division, he ran to the village which had been allotted to Xenophon. He surprised within it the villagers with their headman, and seventeen young horses which were being reared as a tribute for the king, and, last of all, the headman's own daughter, a young bride only eight days wed. Her husband had gone off to chase bares, and so he escaped being taken with the other villagers. The houses were underground structures with an aperture like the mouth of a well by which to enter, but they were broad and spacious below. The entrance for the beasts of burden was dug out, but the human occupants descended by a ladder. In these dwellings were to be found goats and sheep and cattle, and cocks and hens, with their various progeny. The flocks and herds were all reared under cover upon green food. There were stores within of wheat and barley and vegetables, and wine made from barley in great

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

There too the men were feasting in their quarters, garlanded with whisps of hay and dry grass, and Armenian boys were playing the part of waiters in barbaric costumes, only they had to point out by gesture to the boys what they were to do, like deaf and dumb. After the first formalities, when Cheirisophus and Xenophon had greeted one another like bosom friends, they interrogated the headman in common by means of the Persian-speaking interpreter, "What was the country?" they asked: he replied, "Armenia." And again, "For whom are the horses being bred?" "They are tribute for the king," he replied. "And the neighbouring country?" "Is the land of the Chalybes," he said; and he described the road which led to it. So for the present Xenophon went off, taking the headman back with him to his household and friends. He also made him a present of an oldish horse which he had got; he had heard that the headman was a priest of the sun, and so he could fatten up the beast and sacrifice him; otherwise he was afraid it might die outright, for it had been injured by the long marching. For himself he took his pick of the colts, and gave a colt apiece to each of his fellow-generals and officers. The horses here were smaller than the Persian horses, but much more spirited. It was here too that their friend the headman explained to them, how they should wrap small bags or sacks round the feet of the horses and other cattle when marching through the snow, for without such precautions the creatures sank up to their bellies.

VI.—When a week had passed, on the eighth day Xenophon delivered over the guide¹ (that is to say, the village headman) to Cheirisophus. He left the headman's household safe behind in the village, with the exception of his son, a lad in the bloom of youth. This boy was entrusted to Episthenes of Amphipolis to guard; if the headman proved himself a good guide, he was to take away his son also at his departure. They finally made his house the repository of all the good things they could contrive to get together; then they broke up their camp and commenced the march, the headman guiding them through the snow unfettered. When they had reached the third stage Cheirisophus flew into a rage with him, because he had not brought them to any villages. The headman pleaded that there were none in this part. Cheirisophus struck him, but forgot to bind him, and the end of it was that the headman ran away in the night and was gone, leaving his son behind him. This was the sole ground of difference between Cheirisophus and Xenophon during the march, this combination of ill-treatment and neglect in the case of the guide. As to the boy, Episthenes conceived a passion for him, and took him home with him, and found in him the most faithful of friends.

¹ Lit. "him (the headman) as guide."

After this they marched seven stages at the rate of five parasangs a day, to the banks of the river Phasis,¹ which is a hundred feet broad : and thence they marched another couple of stages, ten parasangs ; but at the pass leading down into the plain there appeared in front of them a mixed body of Chalybes and Taochians and Phasians. When Cheirisophus caught sight of the enemy on the pass at a distance of about three or four miles, he ceased marching, not caring to approach the enemy with his troops in column, and he passed down the order to the others : to deploy their companies to the front, that the troops might form into line. As soon as the rearguard had come up, he assembled the generals and officers, and addressed them : "The enemy, as you see, are in occupation of the mountain pass, it is time we should consider how we are to make the best fight to win it. My opinion is, that we should give orders to the troops to take their morning meal, whilst we deliberate whether we should cross the mountains to-day or to-morrow." "My opinion," said Cleanor, "is, that as soon as we have breakfasted, we should arm for the fight and attack the enemy, without loss of time, for if we fritter away to-day, the enemy who are now content to look at us, will grow bolder, and with their growing courage, depend upon it, others more numerous will join them."

After him Xenophon spoke : "This," he said, "is how I see the matter ; if fight we must, let us make preparation to sell our lives dearly, but if we desire to cross with the greatest ease, the point to consider is, how we may get the fewest wounds and throw away the smallest number of good men.

¹ Probably a tributary of the Araxes = modern Pasin-Su, possibly it had this local name.

Well then, that part of the mountain which is visible stretches nearly seven miles.¹ Where are the men posted to intercept us? except at the road itself, they are nowhere to be seen. It is much better then to try if possible to steal a point of this desert mountain unobserved, and before they know where we are, secure the prize, than to fly at a strong position and an enemy thoroughly prepared. Since it is much easier to march up a mountain without fighting than to tramp along a level when assailants are on either hand; and provided he has not to fight, a man will see what lies at his feet much more plainly even at night than in broad daylight in the midst of battle; and a rough road to feet that roam in peace may be pleasanter than a smooth surface with the bullets whistling about your ears.² Nor is it so impossible, I take it, to steal a march, since it is open to us to go by night, when we cannot be seen, and to fall back so far that they will never notice us. In my opinion, however, if we make a feint of attacking here, we shall find the mountain chain all the more deserted elsewhere, since the enemy will be waiting for us here in thicker swarm.

“But what right have I to be drawing conclusions about stealing in your presence, Cheirisophus? for you Lacedaemonians, as I have often been told, you who belong to the ‘peers,’ practise stealing from your boyhood up; and it is no disgrace but honourable rather to steal, except such things as the law forbids; and in order, I presume, to stimulate your sense of secretiveness, and to make you master thieves, it is lawful for you further to get a whipping, if you are caught. Now then you have a fine opportunity of displaying your training. But take care we are not caught stealing over the mountain, or we shall catch it ourselves.” “For all that,” retorted Cheirisophus, “I have heard that you Athenians are clever hands at stealing the public moneys; and that too though there is fearful risk for the person so employed; but, I am told, it is your best men who are most addicted to it; if it is your best men who are thought worthy to rule. So it is a fine opportunity for yourself also, Xenophon, to exhibit your

¹ Lit. “more than sixty stades.”

² Or, more lit., “with the head a mark for missiles.”

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

with his heavy infantry at quick march. But the enemy on the road no sooner saw their higher division being worsted than they fled, and some few of them were slain, and a vast number of wicker shields were taken, which the Hellenes hacked to pieces with their short swords and rendered useless. So when they had reached the summit of the pass, they sacrificed and set up a trophy, and descending into the plain, reached villages abounding in good things of every kind.

VII.—After this they marched into the country of the Taochians five stages—thirty parasangs—and provisions failed ; for the Taochians lived in strong places, into which they had carried up all their stores. Now when the army arrived before one of these strong places—a mere fortress, without city or houses, into which a motley crowd of men and women and numerous flocks and herds were gathered—Cheirisophus attacked at once. When the first regiment fell back tired, a second advanced, and again a third, for it was impossible to surround the place in full force, as it was encircled by a river. Presently Xenophon came up with the rearguard, consisting of both light and heavy infantry, whereupon Cheirisophus hailed him with the words : “In the nick of time you have come ; we must take this place, for the troops have no provisions, unless we take it.” Thereupon they consulted together, and to Xenophon’s inquiry, “What it was which hindered their simply walking in?” Cheirisophus replied, “There is just this one narrow approach which you see ; but when we attempt to pass by it they roll down volleys of stones from yonder overhanging crag,” pointing up, “and this is the state in which you find yourself, if you chance to be caught ;” and he pointed to some poor fellows with their legs or ribs crushed to bits. “But when they have expended their ammunition,” said Xenophon, “there is nothing else, is there, to hinder our passing? Certainly, except yonder handful of fellows, there is no one in front of us that we can see ; and of them, only two or three apparently are armed, and the distance to be traversed under fire is, as your eyes will tell you, about one hundred and fifty feet as near as can be, and of this space the first hundred is thickly covered with great pines at intervals ; under cover of these, what harm can come to our men from a pelt of stones, flying or rolling? So then, there is only fifty feet left to cross, during a lull of stones." "Ay," said Cheirisophus, "but with our first attempt to approach the bush a galling fire of stones commences." "The very thing we want," said the other, "for they will use up their ammunition all the quicker; but let us select a point from which we shall have only a brief space to run across, if we can, and from which it will be easier to get back, if we wish."

Thereupon Cheirisophus and Xenophon set out with Callimachus the Parrhasian, the captain in command of the officers of the rearguard that day; the rest of the captains remained out of danger. That done, the next step was for a party of about seventy men to get away under the trees, not in a body, but one by one, every one using his best precaution; and Agasias the Stymphalian, and Aristonymus the Methydrian, who were also officers of the rearguard, were posted as supports outside the trees; for it was not possible for more than a single company to stand safely within the trees. Here Callimachus hit upon a pretty contrivance—he ran forward from the tree under which he was posted two or three paces, and as soon as the stones came whizzing, he retired easily, but at each excursion more than ten wagon-loads of rocks were expended. Agasias, seeing how Callimachus was amusing himself, and the whole army looking on as spectators, was seized with the fear that he might miss his chance of being first to run the gauntlet of the enemy's fire and get into the place. So, without a word of summons to his next neighbour, Aristonymus, or to Eurylochus of Lusias, both comrades of his, or to any one else, off he set on his own account, and passed the whole detachment. But Callimachus, seeing him tearing past, caught hold of his shield by the rim, and in the meantime Aristonymus the Methydrian ran past both, and after him Eurylochus of Lusias; for they were one and all aspirants to valour, and in that high pursuit, each was the eager rival of the rest. So in this strife of honour, the four of them took the fortress, and when they had once rushed in, not a stone more was hurled from overhead.

And here a terrible spectacle displayed itself: the women first cast their infants down the cliff, and then they cast themselves after their fallen little ones, and the men likewise. In such a scene, Aeneas the Stymphalian, an officer, caught sight of a man with a fine dress about to throw himself over, and seized hold of him to stop him; but the other caught him to his arms, and both were gone in an instant headlong down the crags, and were killed. Out of this place the merest handful of human beings were taken prisoners, but cattle and asses in abundance and flocks of sheep.

From this place they marched through the Chalybes¹ seven stages, fifty parasangs. These were the bravest men whom they encountered on the whole march, coming cheerily to close quarters with them. They wore linen corslets reaching to the groin, and instead of the ordinary "wings" or basques, a thickly-plaited fringe of cords. They were also provided with greaves and helmets, and at the girdle a short sabre, about as long as the Laconian dagger, with which they cut the throats of those they mastered, and after severing the head from the trunk they would march along carrying it, singing and dancing, when they drew within their enemy's field of view.² They carried also a spear fifteen cubits long, lanced at one end.³ This folk stayed in regular townships,⁴ and whenever the Hellenes passed by they invariably hung close on their heels fighting. They had dwelling-places in their fortresses, and into them they had carried up their supplies, so that the Hellenes could get nothing from this district, but supported themselves on the flocks and herds they had taken from the Taochians. After this the Hellenes reached the river Harpasus, which was four hundred feet broad. Hence they marched through the Scythenians four stages—twenty parasangs—through a long level country to more villages, among which they halted three days, and got in supplies.

¹ These are the Armeno-Chalybes, so called by Pliny in contradistinction to another mountain tribe in Pontus so named, who were famous for their forging, and from whom steel received its Greek name χάλυψ. With these latter we shall make acquaintance later on. See below, p. 146; see Mr. Pretor ad loc., and Dr. Kiepert's Man. of Anc. Geog. (Eng. tr. Mr. G. A. Macmillan), iv. 49. 58.

² Or, "Whenever they were to be seen by the enemy."

³ I.e. With a single point or spike only, the Hellenic spear having a spike at the butt end also.

⁴ Or, "remained in their townships, but whenever . . ."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

baggage animals and horses came galloping up. But when they had reached the summit, then indeed they fell to embracing one another—generals and officers and all—and the tears trickled down their cheeks. And on a sudden, some one, whoever it was, having passed down the order, the soldiers began bringing stones and erecting a great cairn, whereon they dedicated a host of untanned skins, and staves, and captured wicker shields, and with his own hand the guide hacked the shields to pieces, inviting the rest to follow his example. After this the Hellenes dismissed the guide with a present raised from the common store, to wit, a horse, a silver bowl, a Persian dress, and ten darics; but what he most begged to have were their rings, and of these he got several from the soldiers. So, after pointing out to them a village where they would find quarters, and the road by which they would proceed towards the land of the Macrones, as evening fell, he turned his back upon them in the night and was gone.

VIII.—From this point the Hellenes marched through the country of the Macrones three stages,—ten parasangs, and on the first day they reached the river, which formed the boundary between the land of the Macrones and the land of the Scythenians. Above them, on their right, they had a country of the sternest and ruggedest character, and on their left another river, into which the frontier river discharges itself, and which they must cross. This was thickly fringed with trees which, though not of any great bulk, were closely packed. As soon as they came up to them, the Hellenes proceeded to cut them down in their haste to get out of the place as soon as possible. But the Macrones, armed with wicker shields and lances and hair tunics, were already drawn up to receive them immediately opposite the crossing. They were cheering one another on, and kept up a steady pelt of stones into the river, though they failed to reach the other side or do any harm.

At this juncture one of the light infantry came up to Xenophon; he had been, he said, a slave at Athens, and he wished to tell him that he recognised the speech of these people. “I think,” said he, “this must be my native country, and if there is no objection I will have a talk with them.” “No objection at all," replied Xenophon, "pray talk to them, and ask them first, who they are." In answer to this question they said, "they were Macrones." "Well, then," said he, "ask them why they are drawn up in battle and want to fight with us." They answered, "Because you are invading our country." The generals bade him say: "If so, it is with no intention certainly of doing it or you any harm: but we have been at war with the king, and are now returning to Hellas, and all we want is to reach the sea." The others asked, "Were they willing to give them pledges to that effect?" They replied: "Yes, they were ready to give and receive pledges to that effect." Then the Macrones gave a barbaric lance to the Hellenes, and the Hellenes a Hellenic lance to them: "for these," they said, "would serve as pledges," and both sides called upon the gods to witness.

After the pledges were exchanged, the Macrones fell to vigorously hewing down trees and constructing a road to help them across, mingling freely with the Hellenes and fraternising in their midst, and they afforded them as good a market as they could, and for three days conducted them on their march, until they had brought them safely to the confines of the Colchians. At this point they were confronted by a great mountain chain, which however was accessible, and on it the Colchians were drawn up for battle. In the first instance, the Hellenes drew up opposite in line of battle, as though they were minded to assault the hill in that order; but afterwards the generals determined to hold a council of war, and consider how to make the fairest fight.

Accordingly Xenophon said: "I am not for advancing in line, but advise to form into column of sections.¹ To begin with, the line," he urged, "would be scattered and thrown into disorder at once; for we shall find the mountain full of inequalities, it will be pathless here and easy to traverse there. The mere fact of first having formed in line, and then seeing the line thrown into disorder, must exercise a disheartening effect. Again, if we advance several deep, the enemy will none the less overlap us, and turn their superfluous numbers to account as best they like; while, if we march in shallow order, we may fully expect our line to be cut through and through by the thick rain of missiles and rush of men, and if this happen anywhere along the line, the whole line will equally suffer. No; my notion is to form columns by companies,¹ covering ground sufficient with spaces between the companies to allow the last companies of each flank to be outside the enemy's flanks. Thus we shall with our extreme companies be outside the enemy's line, and the best men at the head of their columns will lead the attack; and every company will pick its way where the ground is easy; also it will be difficult for the enemy to force his way into the intervening spaces, when there are companies on both sides; nor will it be easy for him to cut in twain any individual company marching in column. If, too, any particular company should be pressed, the neighbouring company will come to the rescue, or if at any point any single company succeed in reaching the height, from that moment not one man of the enemy will stand his ground."

¹ See above for this formation, p. 102.

This proposal was carried, and they formed into columns by companies.² Then Xenophon, returning from the right wing to the left, addressed the soldiers. "Men," he said, "these men whom you see in front of you are the sole obstacles still interposed between us and the haven of our hopes so long deferred. We will swallow them up whole, without cooking,³ if we can."

The several divisions fell into position, the companies were formed into columns, and the result was a total of something like eighty companies of heavy infantry, each company consisting on an average of a hundred men. The light infantry and bowmen were arranged in three divisions—two outside to support the left and the right respectively, and the third in the centre—each division consisting of about six hundred men.⁴

¹ Or, "to advance in a line of company columns."

² For this formation, see The Retreat of the Ten Thousand; a military study for all time, by Lieut.-General J. L. Vaughan, C.B.

³ Or, "We will gobble them raw." He is thinking of the Homeric line (Iliad, iv. 35) ὦμον βεβρώθους Πριάμου . . . "Perchance wert thou to enter within the gates and long walls and devour Priam raw, and Priam's sons and all the Trojans, then mightest thou assuage thine anger."—Leaf.

⁴ This suggests 1800 as the total of the peltasts, 8000 as the total of the hoplites, but the companies were probably not limited to 100, and under "peltasts" were perhaps included other light troops. See above, p. 5, note 7; and below, p. 175, note 3.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

From this place they marched on two stages—seven parasangs—and reached the sea at Trapezus,¹ a populous Hellenic city on the Euxine Sea, a colony of the Sinopeans, in the territory of the Colchians. Here they halted about thirty days in the villages of the Colchians, which they used as a base of operations to ravage the whole territory of Colchis. The men of Trapezus supplied the army with a market, entertained them, and gave them, as gifts of hospitality, oxen and wheat and wine. Further, they negotiated with them in behalf of their neighbours the Colchians, who dwelt in the plain for the most part, and from this folk also came gifts of hospitality in the shape of cattle. And now the Hellenes made preparation for the sacrifice which they had vowed,² and a sufficient number of cattle came in for them to offer thank-offerings for safe guidance to Zeus the Saviour, and to Heracles,³ and to the other gods, according to their vows. They instituted also a gymnastic contest on the mountain side, just where they were quartered, and chose Dracontius, a Spartan⁴ (who had been banished from home when a lad, having unintentionally slain another boy with a blow of his dagger), to superintend the course, and be president of the games.

As soon as the sacrifices were over, they handed over the hides of the beasts to Dracontius, and bade him lead the way to his racecourse. He merely waved his hand and pointed to where they were standing, and said, "There, this ridge is just the place for running, anywhere, everywhere." "But how," it was asked, "will they manage to wrestle on the hard scrubby ground?" "Oh! worse knocks for those who are thrown," the president replied. There was a mile race for boys, the majority being captive lads; and for the long race more than sixty Cretans competed; there was wrestling, boxing, and the pankration.⁵ Altogether it was a beautiful spectacle. There was a large number of entries, and the emulation, with their

¹ Trebizond.

² See above, p. 76.

³ Or, "to sacrifice to Zeus the Preserver, and to Heracles thank-offerings for safe guidance." Heracles (Ἡρακλῆς) the conductor having special sympathy with wanderers.

⁴ For the position of the Spartans in the Laconian constitution, see Müller's Deiener, bk. iii. ch. x. vol. ii. p. 195 foll. (Eng. trans.); Arist. Pol. ii. 9, 15.

⁵ The pankration combined both wrestling and boxing.

companions, male and female, standing as spectators, was immense. There was horse-racing also; the riders had to gallop down a steep incline to the sea, and then turn and come up again to the altar, and on the descent more than half rolled head over heels, and then back they came toiling up the tremendous steep, scarcely out of a walking pace. Loud were the shouts, the laughter, and the cheers.

BOOK V. I. 1-4

[In the preceding portion of the narrative a detailed account is given of all that the Hellenes did, and how they fared on the march up with Cyrus ; and also of all that befell them on their march subsequently, until they reached the seaboard of the Euxine Sea, or Pontus, and the Hellenic city of Trapezus, where they duly offered the sacrifice for safe deliverance which they had vowed to offer as soon as they set foot on a friendly soil.]

1.—After this they met and took counsel concerning the remainder of the march. The first speaker was Antileon of Thurii. He rose and said : “ For my part, sirs, I am weary by this time of getting kit together and packing up for a start, of walking and running and carrying heavy arms, and of tramping along in line, or mounting guard, and doing battle. The sole desire I now have is to cease from all these pains, and for the future, since here we have the sea before us, to sail on and on, ‘ stretched out in sleep,’ like Odysseus,¹ and so to find myself in Hellas.” When they heard these remarks, the soldiers showed their approval with loud cries of “ well said,” and then another spoke to the same effect, and then another, and indeed all present. Then Cheirisophus got up and said : “ I have a friend, sirs, who, as good hap will have it, is now high admiral,² Anaxibius. If you like to send me to him, I think I can safely promise to return with some men-of-war and other vessels which will carry us. All you have to do, if you are really minded to go home by sea, is to wait here till I come. I will be back ere long.” The soldiers were

¹ See Od. xiii. 116.

² Lit. “ navarch.”

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

vessels, there would be no need of the remark, but as that is still problematical, I propose that we should try and get together vessels on the spot also. If he comes and finds us already provided for here, we shall have more ships than we need, that is all ; while, if he fails to bring them, we shall have the local supply to fall back upon. I see ships sailing past perpetually, so we have only to ask the loan of some war-ships from the men of Trapezus, and we can bring them into port, and safeguard them with their rudders unshipped, until we have enough to carry us. By this course I think we shall not fail of finding the means of transport requisite." That resolution was also passed. He proceeded : "Consider whether you think it equitable to support by means of a general fund the ships' companies which we so impress, while they wait here for our benefit, and to agree upon a fare, on the principle of repaying kindnesses in kind." That too was passed. "Well then," said he, "in case, after all, our endeavours should not be crowned with success, and we find that we have not vessels enough, I propose that we should enjoin on the cities along the seaboard the duty of constructing and putting in order the roads, which we hear are impassable. They will be only too glad to obey, no doubt, out of mere terror and their desire to be rid of us."

This last proposal was met by loud cries and protestations against the idea of going by land at all. So, perceiving their infatuation, he did not put the question to the vote, but eventually persuaded the cities voluntarily to construct roads by the suggestion, "If you get your roads in good order, we shall all the sooner be gone." They further got a fifty-oared galley from the Trapezuntines, and gave the command of it to Dexippus, a Laconian, one of the perioeci.¹ This man altogether neglected to collect vessels on the offing, but slunk off himself, and vanished, ship and all, out of Pontus. Later on, however, he paid the penalty of his misdeeds. He became involved in some meddling and making in Thrace at the court of Seuthes, and was put to death by the Laconian Nicander. They also got a thirty-oared galley, the command of which was entrusted to Polycrates, an Athenian, and that officer brought into harbour to the camp all the vessels he could lay his hands on. If these were laden, they took out the freights and appointed guards to keep an eye on their preservation, whilst they used the ships themselves for transport service on the coast. While matters stood at this point, the Hellenes used to make forays with varying success ; sometimes they captured prey and sometimes they failed. On one occasion Cleaenetus led his own and another company against a strong position, and was killed himself, with many others of his party.

¹ A native of the country parts of Laconia. For the position of the perioeci in the Laconian constitution, see Müller's Dorians, ii. 18. As to Dexippus, we shall hear of him again, below, pp. 172, 190 foll.

II.—The time came when it was no longer possible to capture provisions, going and returning to the camp in one day. In consequence of this, Xenophon took some guides from the Trapezuntines and led half the army out against the Drilae, leaving the other half to guard the camp. That was necessary, since the Colchians, who had been ousted from their houses, were assembled thickly, and sat eyeing them from the heights above ; on the other hand the Trapezuntines, being friendly to the native inhabitants, were not for leading the Hellenes to places where it was easy to capture provisions. But against the Drilae, from whom they personally suffered, they would lead them with enthusiasm, up into mountainous and scarcely accessible fortresses, and against the most warlike people of any in the Pontus.

But when the Hellenes had reached the uplands, the Drilae set fire to all their fastnesses which they thought could be taken easily, and beat a retreat ; and except here and there a stray pig or bullock or other animal which had escaped the fire there was nothing to capture ; but there was one fastness which served as their metropolis : into this the different streams of people collected ; round it ran a tremendously deep ravine, and the approaches to the place were difficult. So the light infantry ran forward five or six furlongs in advance of the heavy infantry, and crossed the ravine ; and seeing quantities of sheep and other things, proceeded to attack the place. Close at their heels followed a number of those who had set out on the foray armed with spears, so that the storming party across the ravine amounted to more than two thousand. But, finding that they could not take the place by a coup-de-main, as there was a trench running round it, mounded up some breadth, with a stockade on the top of the earthwork and a close-packed row of wooden bastions, they made an attempt to run back, but the enemy fell upon them from the rear. To get away by a sudden rush¹ was out of the question, since the descent from the fortress into the ravine only admitted of moving in single file. Under the circumstances they sent to Xenophon, who was in command of the heavy infantry. The messenger came and delivered his message: "There is a fastness choke full of all sorts of stores, but we cannot take it, it is too strong; nor can we easily get away; the enemy rush out and deliver battle, and the return is difficult."

On hearing this, Xenophon pushed forward his heavy infantry to the edge of the ravine, and there ordered them to take up a position, while he himself with the officers crossed over to determine whether it were better to withdraw the party already across, or to bring over the heavy infantry also, on the supposition that the fortress might be taken. In favour of the latter opinion it was agreed that the retreat must cost many lives, and the officers were further disposed to think, they could take the place. Xenophon consented, relying on the victims, for the seers had announced, that there would be a battle, but that the result of the expedition would be good. So he sent the officers to bring the heavy troops across, while he himself remained, having drawn off² all the light infantry and forbidden all sharp-shooting at long range. As soon as the heavy infantry had arrived, he ordered each captain to form his company, in whatever way he hoped to make it most effective in the coming struggle. Side by side together they stood, these captains, not for the first time to-day competitors for the award of manly virtue. While they were thus employed, he—the general—was engaged in passing down his order along the ranks of the light infantry and archers respectively to march with the javelin on its thong and the arrow to the string, ready at the word "shoot" to discharge their missiles, while the light troops were to have their wallets well stocked with

¹ Lit. "to make a bolt for it."

² Lit. "having retired the peltasts."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

their position, some about the stockades, others along the road leading up to the citadel. Xenophon and the officers meantime considered the possibility of taking the citadel, for if so, their safety was assured; but if otherwise, it would be very difficult to get away. As the result of their deliberations they agreed that the place was impregnable. Then they began making preparations for the retreat. Each set of men proceeded to pull down the palisading which faced themselves; further, they sent away all who were useless or who had enough to do to carry their burdens, with the mass of the heavy infantry accompanying them; the officers in each case leaving behind men whom they could severally depend upon.

But as soon as they began to retreat, out rushed upon them from within a host of fellows, armed with wicker shields and lances, greaves and Paphlagonian helmets. Others might be seen scaling the houses on this side and that of the road leading into the citadel. Even pursuit in the direction of the gates leading to the citadel was dangerous, since the enemy kept hurling down on them great beams from above, so that to stop and to make off were alike dangerous, and night approaching was full of terrors. But in the midst of their fighting and their despair some god gave them a means of safety. All of a sudden, by whatsoever hand ignited, a flame shot up; it came from a house on the right hand, and as this gradually fell in, the people from the other houses on the right took to their heels and fled.

Xenophon, laying this lesson of fortune to heart,¹ gave orders to set fire to the left-hand houses also, which being of wood burned quickly, with the result that the occupants of these also took to flight. The men immediately at their front were the sole annoyance now, and these were safe to fall upon them as they made their exit and in their descent. Here then the word was passed for all who were out of range to bring up logs of wood and pile them between themselves and the enemy, and when there was enough of these they set them on fire; they also fired the houses along the trench-work itself, so as to occupy the attention of the enemy. Thus they got off, though with difficulty, and escaped from the place by putting a fire between them and the enemy ; and the whole city was burnt down, houses, turrets, stockading, and everything belonging to it except the citadel.

¹ Or, "taking the hint, which chance had given him."

Next day the Hellenes were bent on getting back with the provisions ; but as they dreaded the descent to Trapezus, which was precipitous and narrow, they laid a false ambushade, and a Mysian, called after the name of his nation (Mysus),¹ took ten of the Cretans and halted in some thick brushy ground, where he made a feint of endeavouring to escape the notice of the enemy. The glint of their light shields, which were of brass, now and again gleamed through the brushwood. The enemy, seeing it all through the thicket, were confirmed in their fears of an ambushade. But the army meanwhile was quietly making its descent ; and when it appeared that they had crept down far enough, the signal was given to the Mysian to flee as fast as he could, and he, springing up, fled with his men. The rest of the party, that is the Cretans, saying, "We are caught if we race," left the road and plunged into a wood, and tumbling and rolling down the gullies, were saved. The Mysian, fleeing along the road, kept crying for assistance, which they sent him, and picked him up wounded. The party of rescue now beat a retreat themselves with their face to the foe, exposed to a shower of missiles, to which some of the Cretan bowmen responded with their arrows. In this way they all reached the camp in safety.

III.—Now when Cheirisophus did not arrive, and the supply of ships was insufficient, and to get provisions longer was impossible, they resolved to depart. On board the vessels they embarked the sick, and those above forty years of age, with the boys and women, and all the baggage which the soldiers were not absolutely forced to take for their own use. The two eldest generals, Philesius and Sophaenetus, were put in charge, and so the party embarked, while the rest resumed their march, for the road was now completely constructed. Continuing their march that day and the next, on the third they reached Cerasus, a Hellenic city on the sea, and a colony of Sinope, in the country of the Colchians. Here they halted ten days, and there was a review and numbering of the troops under arms, when there were found to be eight thousand six hundred men. So many had escaped ; the rest had perished at the hands of the enemy, or by reason of the snow, or else disease.

¹ Lit. "Μυός (Mysus), a Mysian by birth, and Μυός (Mysus) by name."

At this time and place they divided the money accruing from the captives sold, and a tithe selected for Apollo and Artemis of the Ephesians was divided between the generals, each of whom took a portion to guard for the gods, Neon the Asinaean¹ taking on behalf of Cheirisophus.

Out of the portion which fell to Xenophon he caused a dedicatory offering to Apollo to be made and dedicated among the treasures of the Athenians at Delphi.² It was inscribed with his own name and that of Proxenus, his friend, who was killed with Clearchus. The gift for Artemis of the Ephesians was, in the first instance, left behind by him in Asia at the time when he left that part of the world himself with Agesilaus on the march into Boeotia.³ He left it behind in charge of Megabyzus, the sacristan of the goddess, thinking that the voyage on which he was starting was fraught with danger. In the event of his coming out of it alive, he charged Megabyzus to restore to him the deposit ; but should any evil happen to him, then he was to cause to be made and to dedicate on his behalf to Artemis, whatsoever thing he thought would be pleasing to the goddess.

In the days of his banishment,⁴ when Xenophon was now established by the Lacedaemonians as a colonist in Scillus,⁵ a

¹ I.e. of Asine, perhaps the place named in Thuc. iv. 13. 54 ; vi. 93, situated on the Western side of the Messenian bay. Strabo, however, speaks of another Asine near Gytheum, but possibly means Las. See Arnold's note to Thuc. iv. 13, and Smith's Dict. Geog. (s. v.)

² Cf. Herod. i. 14 ; Strabo ix. 420 for such private treasuries at Delphi.

³ I.e. in the year B.C. 394. The circumstances under which Agesilaus was recalled from Asia, with the details of his march and the battle of Coronea, are described by Xenophon in the fourth book of the Hellenica.

⁴ Or, "after his banishment."

⁵ Scillus (Σκιλλοῦς), a town of Triphylia, a district of Elis. In B.C. 572 the Eleians had razed Pisa and Scillus to the ground. But between B.C. 392 and 387 the Lacedaemonians, having previously (B.C. 400, Hell. III. ii. 30) compelled the Eleians to renounce their supremacy over their dependent cities, colonised Scillus and eventually gave it to Xenophon, then an exile from Athens. Xenophon resided here from fifteen to twenty years, but was, it is said, expelled from it by the Eleians soon after the battle of Leuctra, in B.C. 371.—Dict. Geog. (s. v.) The site of the place, and of Xenophon's temple, is supposed to be in the neighbourhood of the modern village of Chrestena,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

place which lies on the main road to Olympia, Megabyzus arrived on his way to Olympia as a spectator to attend the games, and restored to him the deposit. Xenophon took the money and bought for the goddess a plot of ground at a point indicated to him by the oracle. The plot, it so happened, had its own Selinus river flowing through it, just as at Ephesus the river Selinus flows past the temple of Artemis, and in both streams fish and mussels are to be found. On the estate at Scillus there is hunting and shooting of all the beasts of the chase that are.

Here with the sacred money he built an altar and a temple, and ever after, year by year, tithed the fruits of the land in their season and did sacrifice to the goddess, while all the citizens and neighbours, men and women, shared in the festival. The goddess herself provided for the banqueters meat and loaves and wine and sweetmeats, with portions of the victims sacrificed from the sacred pasture, as also of those which were slain in the chase; for Xenophon's own lads, with the lads of the other citizens, always made a hunting excursion against the festival day, in which any grown men who liked might join. The game was captured partly from the sacred district itself, partly from Pholoe,¹ pigs and gazelles and stags. The place lies on the direct road from Lacedaemon to Olympia, about twenty furlongs from the temple of Zeus in Olympia, and within the sacred enclosure there is meadow-land and wood-covered hills, suited to the breeding of pigs and goats and cattle and horses, so that even the sumpter animals of the pilgrims passing to the feast fare sumptuously. The shrine is girdled by a grove of cultivated trees, yielding dessert fruits in their season. The temple itself is a facsimile on a small scale of the great temple at Ephesus, and the image of the goddess is like the golden statue at Ephesus, save only that it is made, not of gold, but of cypress wood. Beside the temple stands a column bearing this inscription:—THE PLACE IS SACRED TO ARTEMIS. HE WHO HOLDS IT AND ENJOYS THE FRUITS OF IT IS BOUND TO or possibly nearer Mazi. To reach Olympia, about 2½ miles distant, one must cross the Alpheus. See map.

¹ Pholoe. This mountain (north of the Alpheus) is an offshoot of Erymanthus, crossing the Pisatis from east to west, and separating the waters of the Peneus and the Ladon from those of the Alpheus.—Dict. Geog. (Elis).

SACRIFICE YEARLY A TITHE OF THE PRODUCE. AND FROM THE RESIDUE THEREOF TO KEEP IN REPAIR THE SHRINE. IF ANY MAN FAIL IN AUGHT OF THIS THE GODDESS HERSELF WILL LOOK TO IT THAT THE MATTER SHALL NOT SLEEP.

IV.—From Cerasus they continued the march, the same portion of the troops being conveyed by sea as before, and the rest marching by land. When they had reached the frontiers of the Mossynoecians¹ they sent to them Timesitheus the Trapezuntine, who was the proxenos² of the Mossynoecians, to inquire whether they were to pass through their territory as friends or foes. They, trusting in their strongholds, replied that they would not give them passage. It was then that Timesitheus informed them that the Mossynoecians on the farther side of the country were hostile to these members of the tribe;³ and it was resolved to invite the former to make an alliance, if they wished it. So Timesitheus was sent, and came back with their chiefs. On their arrival there was a conference of the Mossynoecian chiefs and the generals of the Hellenes, and Xenophon made a speech which Timesitheus interpreted. He said: "Men of the Mossynoecians, our desire is to reach Hellas in safety; and since we have no vessels we must needs go by foot, but these people who, as we hear, are your enemies, prevent us. Will you take us for your allies? Now is your chance to exact vengeance for any wrong, which they at any time may have put upon you, and for the future they will be your subjects; but if you send us about our business, consider and ask yourselves from what quarter will you ever again obtain so strong a force to help you?" To this the chief of the Mossynoecians made answer:—that the proposal was in accordance with their wishes and they welcomed the alliance. "Good," said Xenophon, "but to what use do you propose to put us, if we become your allies? And what will you in your turn be able to do to assist our passage?" They replied: "We can make an incursion into this country hostile to yourselves and us, from ¹ I.e. dwellers in mossyns, or Wooden towers. See Herod. iii. 94; vii. 78. Cf. also Strabo, xi. 41.

² Or, "consul." See Hell. I. i. 35.

³ Reading τοῦτοις With Hug.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

they got near the place, they made a sortie and routed them, killing several of the barbarians as well as some of the Hellenes who had gone up with them; and so pursued them until they saw the Hellenes advancing to the rescue. Then they turned round and made off, first cutting off the heads of the dead men and flaunting them in the face of the Hellenes and of their own private foes, dancing the while and singing in a measured strain. But the Hellenes were much vexed to think that their foes had only been rendered bolder, while the Hellenes who had formed part of the expedition had turned tail and fled, in spite of their numbers; a thing which had not happened previously during the whole expedition. So Xenophon called a meeting of the Hellenes and spoke as follows: "Soldiers, do not in any wise be cast down by what has happened, be sure that good no less than evil will be the result; for to begin with, you now know certainly that those who are going to guide us are in very deed hostile to those with whom necessity drives us to quarrel; and, in the next place, some of our own body, these Hellenes who have made so light of orderly array and conjoint action with ourselves, as though they must needs achieve in the company of barbarians all they could with ourselves, have paid the penalty and been taught a lesson, so that another time they will be less prone to leave our ranks. But you must be prepared to show these friendly barbarians that you are of a better sort, and prove to the enemy that battle with the undisciplined is one thing, but with men like yourselves another."

Accordingly they halted, as they were, that day. Next day they sacrificed and finding the victims favourable, they breakfasted, formed the companies into columns, and with the barbarians arranged in similar order on their left, began their march. Between the companies were the archers only slightly retired behind the front of the heavy infantry, on account of the enemy's active light troops, who ran down and kept up volleys of stones. These were held in check by the archers and peltasts; and steadily step by step the mass marched on, first to the position from which the barbarians and those with them¹ had been driven two days back, and where the enemy were now drawn up to meet them. Thus it came to pass that the barbarians first grappled with the peltasts and maintained the battle until the heavy infantry were close, when they turned and fled. The peltasts followed without delay, and pursued them right up to their city, while the heavy troops in unbroken order followed. As soon as they were up at the houses of the capital, there and then the enemy, collecting all together in one strong body, fought valiantly, and hurled their javelins, or else clenched their long stout spears, almost too heavy for a man to wield, and did their best to ward off the attack at close quarters.

¹ Or, "their barbarian allies and their own men with them."

But when the Hellenes, instead of giving way, kept massing together more thickly, the barbarians fled from this place also, and in a body deserted the fortress. Their king, who sat in his wooden tower or mossyn, built on the citadel (there he sits and there they maintain him, all at the common cost, and guard him narrowly),¹ refused to come forth, as did also those in the fortress first taken, and so were burnt to a cinder where they were, their mossyns, themselves, and all. The Hellenes, pillaging and ransacking these places, discovered in the different houses treasures and magazines of loaves, pile upon pile, "the ancestral stores," as the Mossynoecians told them; but the new corn was laid up apart with the straw-stalk and ear together, and this was for the most part spelt. Slices of dolphin were another discovery, in narrow-necked jars, all properly salted and pickled; and there was blubber of dolphin in vessels, which the Mossynoecians used precisely as the Hellenes use oil. Then there were large stores of nuts on the upper floor, the broad kind without a division.² This was also a chief article of food with them—boiled nuts and baked loaves. Wine was also discovered. This, from its rough, dry quality, tasted sharp when drunk pure, but mixed with water was sweet and fragrant.

The Hellenes breakfasted and then started forward on their march, having first delivered the stronghold to their allies among the Mossynoecians. As for the other strongholds belonging to tribes allied with their foes, which they passed en route, the most accessible were either deserted by their inhabitants or gave in their adhesion voluntarily. The following description will apply to the majority of them : the cities were on an average ten miles apart, some more, some less ; but so elevated is the country and intersected by such deep clefts that if they chose to shout across to one another, their cries would be heard from one city to another. When, in the course of their march, they came upon a friendly population, these would entertain them with exhibitions of fatted children belonging to the wealthy classes, fed up on boiled chestnuts until they were as white as white can be, of skin plump and delicate, and very nearly as broad as they were long, with their backs variegated and their breasts tattooed with patterns of all sorts of flowers. They sought after the women in the Hellenic army, and would fain have lain with them openly in broad daylight, for that was their custom. The whole community, male and female alike, were fair-complexioned and white-skinned.

¹ Or, "protect him."

² I.e. "chestnuts."

It was agreed that this was the most barbaric and outlandish people that they had passed through on the whole expedition, and the furthest removed from Hellenic customs, doing in a crowd precisely what other people would prefer to do in solitude, and when alone behaving exactly as others would behave in company, talking to themselves and laughing at their own expense, standing still and then again capering about, wherever they might chance to be, without rhyme or reason, as if their sole business were to show off to the rest of the world.

v.—Through this country, friendly or hostile as the chance might be, the Hellenes marched, eight stages in all, and reached the Chalybes.¹ These were a people few in number, and subject to the Mossynoecians. Their livelihood was for the most part derived from mining and forging iron.

Thence they came to the Tibarenians. The country of the Tibarenians was far more level, and their fortresses lay on the seaboard and were less strong, whether by art or nature. The generals wanted to attack these places, so that the army might get some pickings,² and they would not accept the gifts of

¹ See above, p. 124, note 1.

² Or, "these the generals wished to attack, so that the army might be benefited somewhat," but the Greek is more colloquial.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies to dwell in, having taken it from the barbarians ; for which reason also they, with the men of Cerasus and Trapezus, pay us an appointed tribute. So that, whatever mischief you inflict on the men of Cotyora, the city of Sinope takes as personal to herself. At the present time we hear that you have made forcible entry into their city, some of you, and are quartered in the houses, besides taking forcibly from the Cotyorite estates whatever you need, by hook and by crook. Now against these things we enter protest. If you mean to go on so doing, you will drive us to make friends with Corylas and the Paphlagonians, or any one else we can find."

To meet these charges Xenophon, in behalf of the soldiers, rose and said : " As to ourselves, men of Sinope, having got so far, we are well content to have saved our bodies and our arms. Indeed it was impossible at one and the same moment to keep our enemies at bay and to despoil them of their goods and chattels. And now, since we have reached Hellenic cities, how has it fared with us? At Trapezus they gave us a market, and we paid for our provisions at a fair market price. In return for the honour they did us, and the gifts of hospitality they gave the army, we requited them with honour. Where the barbarian was friendly to them, we stayed our hands from injury ; or under their escort, we did damage to their enemies to the utmost of our power. Ask them, what sort of people they found us. They are here, some of them, to answer for themselves. Their fellow-citizens and the state of Trapezus, for friendship's sake, have sent them with us to act as our guides.

" But wherever we come, be it foreign or Hellenic soil, and find no market for provisions, we are wont to help ourselves, not out of insolence but from necessity. There have been tribes like the Carduchians, the Taochians, the Chaldaeans, which, albeit they were not subject to the great king, yet were no less formidable than independent. These we had to bring over by our arms. The necessity of getting provisions forced us ; since they refused to offer us a market. Whereas some other folk, like the Macrones, in spite of their being barbarians, we regarded as our friends, simply because they did afford us the best market in their power, and we took no single thing of theirs by force. But, to come to these Cotyorites, whom you claim to be your people, if we have taken aught from them, they have themselves to blame, for they did not deal with us as friends, but shut their gates in our faces. They would neither welcome us within nor furnish us with a market without. The only justification they alleged was that your governor¹ had authorised this conduct.

"As to your assertion," he continued, turning to Hecatonymus, "that we have got in by force and have taken up quarters, this is what we did. We requested them to receive our sick and wounded under cover; and when they refused to open their gates, we walked in where the place itself invited us. All the violence we have committed amounts to this, that our sick folk are quartered under cover, paying for their expenses, and we keep a sentry at the gates, so that our sick and wounded may not lie at the mercy of your governor, but we may have it in our power to remove them whenever we like. The rest of us, you observe, are camping under the canopy of heaven, in regular rank and file, and we are ready to requite kindness with kindness, but to repel evil vigorously. And as for your threat," he said, once again turning to the spokesman, "that you will, if it suits you, make alliance with Corylas and the Paphlagonians to attack us, for our part, we have no objection to fighting both sets of you, if so be we must; we have already fought others many times more numerous than you. Besides, 'if it suits us,' as you put it, to make the Paphlagonian our friend (report says that he has a hankering after your city and some other places on the seaboard), we can enhance the value of our friendship by helping to win for him what he covets."

Thereupon the ambassadors showed very plainly their annoyance with Hecatonymus, on account of the style of his remarks, and one of them stepped forward to explain that their intention in coming was not at all to raise a war, but on the contrary to demonstrate their friendliness. “And if you come to Sinope itself,” the speaker continued, “we will welcome you there with gifts of hospitality. Meanwhile we will enjoin upon the citizens of this place to give you what they can; for we can see that every word of what you say is true.” Thereupon the Cotyorites sent gifts of hospitality, and the generals of the Hellenes entertained the ambassadors of the Sinopeans. Many and friendly were the topics of conversation; freely flowed the talk on things in general; and, in particular, both parties were able to make inquiries and satisfy their curiosity concerning the remaining portion of the march.¹

¹ Lit. "harmost." See below, pp. 175, 183, 191; Hell. I. ii. 18; Thuc. viii. 5. The term, denoting properly a governor of the islands and foreign cities sent out by the Lacedaemonians during their supremacy (see L. and S., s. v.), came, it would seem, to be adopted by other Greek communities under somewhat similar circumstances. Cotyora receives a harmost from her mother-city, Sinope. For the Greek colonies here mentioned, see Kiepert's Man. Anct. Geog. (Eng. tr., Mr. G. A. Macmillan), p. 63, § 59.

VI.—Such was the conclusion of that day. On the following day the generals summoned an assembly of the soldiers, when it was resolved to invite the men of Sinope, and to take advice with them touching the remainder of the journey. In the event of their having to continue it on foot, the Sinopeans through their acquaintance with Paphlagonia would be useful to them; while, if they had to go by sea, the services of the same people would be at a premium;² for who but they could furnish ships sufficient for the army? Accordingly, they summoned their ambassadors, and took counsel with them, begging them, on the strength of the sacred ties which bind Hellenes to Hellenes, to inaugurate the good reception they had spoken of, by present kindness and their best advice.

Hecatonymus rose and wished at once to offer an apology with regard to what he had said about the possibility of making friends with the Paphlagonians. “The words were not intended,” he said, “to convey a threat, as though they were minded to go to war with the Hellenes, but as meaning rather: albeit we have it in our power to be friendly with the barbarians, we will choose the Hellenes.” Then, being urged to aid them by some advice, with a pious ejaculation, he commenced: “If I bestow upon you the best counsel I am able, God grant that blessings in abundance may descend on me; but if the contrary, may

¹ Or, “to make inquiries concerning the remaining portion of the march, and learn what each respectively stood in need of.”

² Or, “for if they should have to continue their journey on foot, the people of Sinope appeared likely to be useful through their acquaintance with Paphlagonia, and still more if they had to go by sea.”

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

same way too the Parthenius is impassable, which you will reach if you cross the Halys. For my part, then, I consider the land-journey, I will not say difficult, but absolutely impossible for you. Whereas if you go by sea, you can coast along from here to Sinope, and from Sinope to Heraclea. From Heraclea onwards there is no difficulty, whether by land or by sea ; for there are plenty of vessels at Heraclea."

After he had finished his remarks, some of his hearers thought they detected a certain bias in them. He would not have spoken so, but for his friendship with Corylas, whose official representative¹ he was. Others guessed he had an itching palm, and that he was hoping to receive a present for his "sacred advice." Others again suspected that his object was to prevent their going by foot and doing some mischief to the country of the Sinopeans. However that might be, the Hellenes voted in favour of continuing the journey by sea. After this Xenophon said : "Sinopeans, the army has chosen that method of procedure which you advise, and thus the matter stands. If there are sure to be vessels enough to make it impossible for a single man to be left behind, go by sea we will ; but if part of us are to be left while part go by sea, we will not set foot on board the vessels. One fact we plainly recognise, strength is everything to us. So long as we have the mastery, we shall be able to protect ourselves and get provisions ; but if we are once caught at the mercy of our foes, it is plain, we shall be reduced to slavery."² On hearing this the ambassadors³ bade them send an embassy, which they did, to wit, Callimachus the Arcadian, and Ariston the Athenian, and Samolas the Achæan.

So these set off, but meanwhile a thought shaped itself in the mind of Xenophon, as there before his eyes lay that vast army of Hellene hoplites, and that other array of peltasts, archers, and slingers, with cavalry to boot, and all in a state of thorough efficiency from long practice, hardened veterans, and all collected in Pontus, where to raise so large a force would cost a mint of money. Then⁴ the idea dawned upon him : how noble an opportunity to acquire new territory and power for Hellas, by the founding of a colony—a city of no mean size, moreover, said he to himself, as he reckoned up their own numbers—and besides themselves a population planted on the shores of Pontus. Thereupon he summoned Silanus the Ambraciot, the soothsayer of Cyrus above mentioned,¹ and before breathing a syllable to any of the soldiers, he consulted the victims by sacrifice.

¹ Lit. "proxenos" ; see p. 142 above. The office closely resembled that of our consul. ² Lit. "to the level of captive slaves." ³ I.e. from Sinope.

⁴ For the colonisation scheme, see above, p. 80, note 1.

But Silanus, in apprehension lest these ideas might embody themselves, and the army be permanently halted at some point or other, set a tale going among the men, to the effect that Xenophon was minded to detain the army and found a city in order to win himself a name and acquire power, Silanus himself being minded to reach Hellas with all possible speed, for the simple reason that he had still got the three thousand darics presented to him by Cyrus on the occasion of the sacrifice when he hit the truth so happily about the ten days.² Silanus's story was variously received, some few of the soldiers thinking it would be an excellent thing to stay in that country ; but the majority were strongly averse. The next incident was that Timasion the Dardanian, with Thorax the Boeotian, addressed themselves to some Heracleot and Sinopean traders who had come to Cotyora, and told them that if they did not find means to furnish the army with pay sufficient to keep them in provisions on the homeward voyage, all that great force would most likely settle down permanently in Pontus. "Xenophon has a pet idea," they continued, "which he urges upon us. We are to wait until the ships come, and then we are suddenly to turn round to the army and say : 'Soldiers, we now see the straits we are in, unable to keep ourselves in provisions on the return voyage, or to make our friends at home a little present at the end of our journey.'³ But if you like to select some place on the inhabited seaboard of the Black Sea which may take your fancy and there put in, this is open to you to do. Those who like to go home, go ; those who care to stay here, stay. You have got vessels now, so that you can make a sudden pounce upon any point you choose.' ”

¹ See above, p. 26.

² Or, "When his statement proved correct." See above, p. 26.

³ Or, "to do one's friends at home a good turn."

The merchants went off with this tale and reported it to every city they came to in turn, nor did they go alone, but Timasion the Dardanian sent a fellow-citizen of his own, Eurymachus, with the Boeotian Thorax, to repeat the same story. So when it reached the ears of the men of Sinope and the Heracleots, they sent to Timasion and pressed him to accept of a gratuity, in return for which he was to arrange for the departure of the troops. Timasion was only too glad to hear this, and he took the opportunity when the soldiers were convened in meeting to make the following remarks: “Soldiers,” he said, “do not set your thoughts on staying here; let Hellas, and Hellas only, be the object of your affection, for I am told that certain persons have been sacrificing on this very question, without saying a word to you. Now I can promise you, if you once leave these waters, to furnish you with regular monthly pay, dating from the first of the month, at the rate of one cyzicene¹ a head per month. I will bring you to the Troad, from which part I am an exile, and my own state is at your service. They will receive me with open arms. I will be your guide personally, and I will take you to places where you will get plenty of money. I know every corner of the Aeolid, and Phrygia, and the Troad, and indeed the whole satrapy of Pharnabazus, partly because it is my birthplace, partly from campaigns in that region with Clearchus and Dercylidas.”²

No sooner had he ceased than up got Thorax the Boeotian. This was a man who had a standing battle with Xenophon about the generalship of the army. What he said was that, if they once got fairly out of the Euxine, there was the Chersonese, a beautiful and prosperous country, where they could settle or not, as they chose. Those who liked could stay; and

¹ A cyzicene stater = twenty-eight silver drachmæ of Attic money B.C. 335. in the time of Demosthenes; but, like the daric (see above, p. 26), this gold coin would fluctuate in value relatively to silver. It contained more grains of gold than the daric.

² Of Dercylidas we hear more in the Hellenica. In B.C. 411 he was harmost at Abydos; in B.C. 399 he superseded Thimbron in Asia Minor; and was himself superseded by Agesilaus in B.C. 396.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

I saw that you were in any difficulties, I should set myself to discover how you might capture a city, on the understanding of course that all who wished might sail away at once, leaving those who did not wish, to follow at a later date, with something perhaps in their pockets to benefit their friends at home. Now, however, as I see that the men of Heraclea and Sinope are to send you ships to assist you to sail away, and more than one person guarantees to give you regular monthly pay, it is, I admit, a rare chance to be safely piloted to the haven of our hopes, and at the same time to receive pay for our preservation. For myself I have done with that dream, and to those, who came to me to urge these projects, my advice is to have done with them. In fact, this is my view. As long as you stay together united as to-day, you will command respect and procure provisions; for might certainly exercises a right over what belongs to the weaker. But once broken up, with your force split into little bits, you will neither be able to get subsistence, nor indeed will you get off without paying dearly for it. In fact, my resolution coincides precisely with yours. It is that we should set off for Hellas, and if any one stops behind, or is caught deserting before the whole army is in safety, let him be judged as an evil-doer. Pray let all who are in favour of this proposition hold up their hands."

They all held them up; only Silanus began shouting and vainly striving to maintain the right of departure for all who liked to depart. But the soldiers would not suffer him, threatening him that if he were himself caught attempting to run away they would inflict the aforesaid penalty. After this, when the Heracleots learnt that the departure by sea was resolved upon, and that the measure itself emanated from Xenophon, they sent the vessels indeed; but as to the money which they had promised to Timasion and Thorax as pay for the soldiers, they were not as good as their word, in fact they cheated them both. Thus the two who had guaranteed regular monthly pay were utterly confounded, and stood in terror of the soldiers. What they did then, was to take to them the other generals to whom they had communicated their former transactions (that is to say, all except Neon the Asinaean, who, as lieutenant-general, was acting for Cheirisophus during his continued absence). This done they came in a body to Xenophon and said that their views were changed. As they had now got the ships, they thought it best to sail to the Phasis, and seize the territory of the Phasians (whose present king was a descendant of Aeetes).¹ Xenophon's reply was curt:—Not one syllable would he have to say himself to the army in this matter, "But," he added, "if you like, you can summon an assembly and say your say." Thereupon Timasion the Dardanian set forth as his opinion:—It were best to hold no parliament at present, but first to go and conciliate, each of them, his own officers. Thus they went away and proceeded to execute their plans.

VII.—Presently the soldiers came to learn what was in course of agitation, and Neon gave out that Xenophon had persuaded the other generals to adopt his views, and had a plan to cheat the soldiers and take them back to the Phasis. The soldiers were highly indignant; meetings were held; little groups gathered ominously; and there seemed an alarming probability that they would repeat the violence with which they had lately treated the heralds of the Colchians and the clerks of the market; when all who did not save themselves by jumping into the sea were stoned to death. So Xenophon, seeing what a storm was brewing, resolved to anticipate matters so far as to summon a meeting of the men without delay, and thus prevent their collecting of their own accord, and he ordered the herald to announce an assembly. The voice of the herald was no sooner heard than they rushed with great readiness to the place of meeting. Then Xenophon, without accusing the generals of having come to him, made the following speech: "I hear that a charge is brought against me. It is I apparently who am going to cheat you and carry you off to Phasis. I beg you by all that is holy to listen to me; and if there be found any guilt in me, let me not leave this place till I have paid the penalty of my misdoing; but if my accusers are found guilty, treat them as they deserve. I presume, sirs, you know where the sun rises and where he sets, and that he who would go to Hellas must needs journey towards the sunset; whereas he who seeks the land of the barbarian must contrariwise fix his face towards the dawn. Now is that a point in which a man might hope to cheat you? Could any one make you believe that the sun rises here and sets there, or that he sets here and rises there?¹ And doubtless you know this too, that it is Boreas, the north wind, who bears the mariner out of Pontus towards Hellas, and the south wind inwards towards the Phasis, whence the saying—

¹ Aeetes (Αἰήτης) is the patronym of the kings of Colchis from mythical times onwards; e.g. Medea was the daughter of Aeetes.

“ ‘ When the North wind doth blow Home to Hellas we will go.’ ”²

“ He would be a clever fellow who could befool you into embarking with a south wind blowing. That sounds all very well, you think, only I may get you on board during a calm. Granted, but I shall be on board my one ship, and you on board another hundred at least, and how am I to constrain you to voyage with me against your will, or by what cajolery shall I carry you off? But I will imagine you so far befooled and bewitched by me, that I have got you to the Phasis; we proceed to disembark on dry land. At last it will come out, that wherever you are, you are not in Hellas, and the inventor of the trick will be one sole man, and you who have been caught by it will number something like ten thousand with swords in your hands. I do not know how a man could better ensure his own punishment than by embarking on such a policy with regard to himself and you.

“ Nay, these tales are the invention of silly fellows who are jealous of the honour you bestow on me. A most uncalled-for jealousy! Do I hinder any of them from speaking any word of import in his power? of striking a blow in your behalf and his own, if that is his choice? or, finally, of keeping his eyes and ears open to secure your safety? What is it? In your choice of leaders do I stand in the way of any one, is that it? Let him step forward, I yield him place; he shall be your general; only he must prove that he has your good at heart.

¹ Or, “ rises in the west and sets in the east ? ”

² *ὅταν Βορρᾶς πνέῃ
καλοὶ πλοῖ εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα.*

Whether this was a local saying or a proverb I cannot say. The words have a poetical ring about them: “ When Borras blows, fair voyages to Hellas.”

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

After this, according to what the Cerasuntines state, there arrived three inhabitants of the place which had been attacked; three elderly men, seeking an interview with our public assembly. Not finding us, they addressed themselves to the men of Cerasus, and told them, they were astonished that we should have thought it right to attack them; however, when, as the Cerasuntines assert, they had assured them that the occurrence was not authorised by public consent, they were pleased, and proposed to sail here, not only to state to us what had occurred, but to offer that those who were interested should take up and bury the bodies of the slain.

“But among the Hellenes still at Cerasus were some of those who had escaped. They found out in which direction the barbarians were minded to go, and not only had the face themselves to pelt them with stones, but vociferously encouraged their neighbours to do the same. The three men—ambassadors, mark you—were slain, stoned to death. After this occurrence, the men of Cerasus came to us and reported the affair, and we generals, on being informed, were annoyed at what had taken place, and took counsel with the Cerasuntines how the dead bodies of the Hellenes might be buried. While seated in conclave outside the camp, we suddenly were aware of a great hubbub. We heard cries: ‘Cut them down!’ ‘Shoot them!’ ‘Stone them!’¹ and presently we caught sight of a mass of people racing towards us with stones in their hands, and others picking them up. The Cerasuntines, naturally enough, considering the incident they had lately witnessed, retired in terror to their vessels, and, upon my word, some of us did not feel too comfortable. All I could do was to go to them and inquire what it all meant. Some of them had not the slightest notion, although they had stones in their hands, but chancing on some one who was better informed, I was told by him that ‘the clerks of the market were treating the army most scandalously.’ Just then some one got sight of the market clerk, Zelarchus, making his way off towards the sea, and lifted up his voice aloud, and the rest responding to the cry as if a wild boar or a stag had been started, they rushed upon him.

¹ Lit. “strike! strike! pelt! pelt!”—παῖε παῖε βάλλε βάλλε, παλεῖν indicating a blow (of a sword or spear), βάλλειν a shot (of an arrow or javelin or slingstone).

“The Cerasuntines, seeing a rush in their direction, thought that, without a doubt, it was directed against themselves, and fled with all speed and threw themselves into the sea, in which proceeding they were imitated by some few of our own men, and all who did not know how to swim were drowned. But now, what do you think of their case, these men of Cerasus? They had done no wrong. They were simply afraid that some madness had seized us, like that to which dogs are liable.

“I say then, if proceedings like this are to be the order of the day, you had better consider what the ultimate condition of the army is like to be. As a body you will not have it in your power to undertake war against whom you like, or to conclude peace. But in private any one who chooses will conduct the army on any quest which takes his fancy. And when ambassadors come to you to demand peace, or whatever it may be, officious people will put them to death and prevent your hearing the proposals which brought them to you.¹ The next step will be that those whom you as a body may choose as generals will be of no account; but any one who likes to elect himself general, and will adopt the formula ‘Shoot him! shoot him!’ will be competent to cut down whomsoever he pleases untried, be it general or private soldier, if only he have sufficient followers, as was the case just now. But just consider what these self-appointed generals have achieved for you. Zelarchus, the clerk of the market, may possibly have done you a wrong; if so, he has sailed off and is gone without paying you any penalty; or he may be guiltless, in which case we have driven him from the army in terror of perishing unjustly without even a trial. While those who stoned the ambassadors have contrived so cleverly that we alone of all Hellenes cannot approach Cerasus safely without a strong force, and the corpses which the very men who slew them themselves invited us to bury, we cannot now pick up with safety even under a flag of truce. Who indeed would care to carry a flag of truce, or go as a herald with the blood of heralds upon his hands? All we could do was to implore the Cerasuntines to bury them.

¹ Or, ‘any one who pleases will kill them, and prevent your hearing the proposals of those who seek you.’

“If then you approve of such doings, have a resolution passed to that effect, so that, with a prospect of like occurrences in the future, a man may privately set up a guard and do his best to fix his tent where he can find a strong position with a commanding site. If, however, these seem to you to be the deeds rather of wild beasts than of human beings, bethink you of some means by which to stay them; or else, in heaven’s name, how shall we do sacrifice to the gods gladly, with impious deeds to answer for? or how shall we, who lay the knife to each other’s throats, give battle to our enemies? What friendly city will receive us when they see rampant lawlessness in our midst? Who will have the courage to afford us a market, when we prove our worthlessness in these weightiest concerns? and what becomes of the praise we expect to win from the mouths of men? who will vouchsafe it to us, if this is our behaviour? Should we not ourselves bestow the worst of names on the perpetrators of like deeds?”

After this they rose, and, as one man, proposed that the ringleaders in these matters should be punished; and that for the future, to set an example of lawlessness should be forbidden. Every such ringleader was to be prosecuted on the capital charge; the generals were to bring all offenders to the bar of justice; prosecutions for all other misdemeanours committed since the death of Cyrus were to be instituted; and they ended by constituting the officers into a board of dicasts;¹ and upon the strong representation of Xenophon, with the concurrence of the soothsayers, it was resolved to purify the army, and this purification was made.

VIII.—It was further resolved that the generals themselves should undergo a judicial examination in reference to their conduct in past time. In course of investigation,² Philesius and Xanthicles respectively were condemned to pay a sum of

¹ I.e. a board of judges or jurors. See Xen. Works, I. p. 30, note 1.

² Or., “When the inquiry took place,” lit. “they (the generals) giving an account.”

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

messmates to drive a mule, although he was a free man. Then at last he recognised him, and inquired: "Are you the fellow who carried home the sick man?" "Yes, I am," said he, "thanks to your driving; and you made havoc of my messmates' kit." "Havoc!" said Xenophon: "Nay, I distributed it; some to one man, some to another to carry, and bade them bring the things safely to me; and when I got them back I delivered them all safely to you, when you, on your side, had rendered an account to me of the man. Let me tell you," he continued, turning to the court, "what the circumstances were; it is worth hearing:—

"A man was left behind from inability to proceed farther; I recognised the poor fellow sufficiently to see that he was one of ours, and I forced you, sir, to carry him to save his life. For, if I am not much mistaken, the enemy were close at our heels?" The fellow assented to this. "Well then," said Xenophon, "after I had sent you forward, I overtook you again, as I came up with the rearguard; you were digging a trench with intent to bury the man; I pulled up and said something in commendation; as we stood by the poor fellow twitched his leg, and the bystanders all cried out, 'Why, the man's alive!' Your remark was: 'Alive or not as he likes, I am not going to carry him.' Then I struck you. Yes! you are right, for it looked very much as if you knew him to be alive." "Well," said he, "was he any the less dead when I reported him to you?" "Nay," retorted Xenophon, "by the same token we shall all one day be dead, but that is no reason why meantime we should all be buried alive?" Then there was a general shout: "If Xenophon had given the fellow a few more blows, it might have been better." The others were now called upon to state the grounds on which they had been beaten in each case; but when they refused to get up, he proceeded to state them himself.

"I confess, sirs, to having struck certain men for failure in discipline.¹ These were men who were quite content to owe their safety to us. Whilst the rest of the world marched on in rank and did whatever fighting had to be done, they preferred to leave the ranks, and rush forward to loot and enrich themselves at our expense. Now, if this conduct were to be the rule, general ruin would be the result. I do not deny that I have given blows to this man or the other who played the poltroon and refused to get up, helplessly abandoning himself to the enemy; and so I forced them to march on. For once in the severe wintry weather I myself happened to sit down for a long time, whilst waiting for a party who were getting their kit together, and I discovered how difficult it was to get up again and stretch one's legs. After this personal experience, whenever I saw any one else seated in slack and lazy mood, I tried to spur him on. The mere movement and effort to play the man caused warmth and moisture, whereas it was plain that sitting down and keeping quiet helped the blood to freeze and the toes to mortify, calamities which really befell several of the men, as you yourselves are aware.

¹ Or, "for disorderly behaviour and want of discipline."

"I can imagine a third case, that of some straggler stopping behind, merely to rest for rest's sake, and hindering you in front and us behind alike from pressing on the march. If he got a blow with the fist from me it saved him a thrust with the lance from the enemy. In fact, the opportunity they enjoy to-day of taking vengeance on me for any treatment which I put upon them wrongfully, is derived from their salvation then; whereas, if they had fallen into the enemy's hands, let them ask themselves for what outrage, however great, they could expect to get satisfaction now. My defence," he continued, "is simple: if I chastised any one for his own good, I claim to suffer the same penalties as parents pay their children or masters their boys. Does not the surgeon also cauterise and cut us for our good? But if you really believe that these acts are the outcome of wanton insolence, I beg you to observe that although to-day, thank God! I am heartier than formerly, I wear a bolder front now than then, and I drink more wine, yet I never strike a soul; no, for I see that you have reached smooth water. When storm arises, and a great sea strikes the vessel amidships, a mere shake of the head will make the look-out man furious with the crew in the forecastle, or the helmsman with the men in the stern sheets, for at such a crisis even a slight slip may ruin everything.

But I appeal to your own verdict, already recorded, in proof that I was justified in striking these men. You stood by, sirs, with swords, not voting tablets, in your hands, and it was in your power to aid the fellows if you liked; but, to speak the honest truth, you neither aided them nor did you join me in striking the disorderly. In other words, you enabled any evilly-disposed person among them to give rein to his wantonness by your passivity. For if you will be at pains to investigate, you will find that those who were then most cowardly are the ringleaders to-day in brutality and outrage.

“There is Boïscus the boxer, a Thessalian, what a battle he fought then to escape carrying his shield! so tired was he, and to-day I am told he has stripped several citizens of Cotyora of the clothes on their backs. If then you are wise, you will treat this personage in a way the contrary to that in which men treat dogs. A savage dog is tied up in the day and loosed at night, but if you are wise you will tie this fellow up at night and only let him loose in the day.

“But really,” he added, “it does surprise me with what keenness you remember and recount the times when I incurred the hatred of some one; but some other occasions when I eased the burthen of winter and storm for any of you, or beat off an enemy, or helped to minister to you in sickness and want, not a soul of you remembers these. Or when for any noble deed done by any of you I praised the doer, and according to my ability did honour to this brave man or that; these things have slipped from your memories, and are clean forgotten. Yet it were surely more noble, just, and holy, sweeter and kindlier to treasure the memory of good rather than of evil.”

He ended, and then one after another of the assembly got up and began recalling incidents of the kind suggested, and things ended not so unpleasantly after all.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

wounded, so skilfully and artistically did he fall, and the Paphlagonians screamed out. Then he that gave the blow stripped the other of his arms, and marched off chanting the "Sitalcas,"¹ whilst others of the Thracians bore off the other, who lay as if dead, though he had not received even a scratch.

After this some Aenianians² and Magnesians got up and fell to dancing the Carpaea, as it is called, under arms. This was the manner of the dance: one man lays aside his arms and proceeds to drive a yoke of oxen, and while he drives he sows, turning him about frequently, as though he were afraid of something; up comes a cattle-lifter, and no sooner does the ploughman catch sight of him afar, than he snatches up his arms and confronts him. They fight in front of his team, and all in rhythm to the sound of the pipe. At last the robber binds the countryman and drives off the team. Or sometimes the cattle-driver binds the robber, and then he puts him under the yoke beside the oxen, with his two hands tied behind his back, and off he drives.

After this a Mysian came in with a light shield in either hand and danced, at one time going through a pantomime, as if he were dealing with two assailants at once; at another plying his shields as if to face a single foe, and then again he would whirl about and throw somersaults, keeping the shields in his hands, so that it was a beautiful spectacle. Last of all he danced the Persian dance,³ clashing the shields together, crouching down on one knee and springing up again from earth; and all this he did in measured time to the sound of the flute. After him the Mantineans stepped upon the stage, and some other Arcadians also stood up; they had accoutred themselves in all their warlike finery. They marched with measured tread, pipes playing, to the tune of the 'warriors' march';⁴ the notes

¹ i.e. the national Thracian hymn; for Sitalcas the king, a national hero, see Thuc. ii. 29.

² The Aenianians, an Aeolian people inhabiting the upper valley of the Sperchius (the ancient Phthia); their capital was Hypata. These men belonged to the army collected by Menon, the Thessalian, see above, p. 5. So, doubtless, did the Magnesians, another Aeolian tribe occupying the mountainous coast district on the east of Thessaly. See Kiepert's Man. Anct. Geog. (Macmillan's tr.), chap. vii. 161, 170.

³ Lit. "the Persian," as we say "the Schottische," or "the Polonaise."

⁴ See Plato, Rep. 400 B, for this "war measure"; also Aristoph. Clouds, 653.

of the paean rose, lightly their limbs moved in dance, as in solemn procession to the holy gods. The Paphlagonians looked upon it as something truly strange that all these dances should be under arms; and the Mysians, seeing their astonishment, persuaded one of the Arcadians who had got a dancing girl to let him introduce her, which he did after dressing her up magnificently and giving her a light shield. When, lithe of limb, she danced the Pyrrhic,¹ loud clapping followed; and the Paphlagonians asked, "If these women fought by their side in battle?" to which they answered, "To be sure, it was the women who routed the great King, and drove him out of camp."² So ended the night.

But next day the generals introduced the embassy to the army, and the soldiers passed a resolution in the sense proposed: between themselves and the Paphlagonians there was to be a mutual abstinence from injuries. After this the ambassadors went their way, and the Hellenes, as soon as it was thought that sufficient vessels had arrived, went on board ship, and voyaged a day and a night with a fair breeze, keeping Paphlagonia on their left. And on the following day, arriving at Sinope, they came to moorings in the harbour of Harmene, near Sinope.³ The Sinopeans, though inhabitants of Paphlagonia, are really colonists of the Milesians. They sent gifts of hospitality to the Hellenes, three thousand measures⁴ of barley with fifteen hundred jars of wine. At this place Cheirisophus rejoined them with a man-of-war. The soldiers certainly expected that, having come, he would have brought them something, but he brought them nothing, except complimentary phrases, on the part of Anaxibius, the high admiral, and the rest, who sent them their congratulations, coupled with a promise on the part of Anaxibius that, as soon as they were outside the Euxine, pay would be forthcoming.

¹ For this famous dance, supposed to be of Doric (Cretan or Spartan) origin, see Smith's Dict. of Antiquities, "Saltatio"; also Guhl and Koner, The Life of the Greeks and Romans, Eng. tr. § 67, pp. 272 and foll.

² See above, pp. 35, 36.

³ Harmene, a port of Sinope, between four and five miles (fifty stades) west of that important city, itself a port town. See Smith, Dict. Geog., "Sinope"; and Kiepert, op. cit. chap. iv. 60.

⁴ Lit. "three thousand medimni." The medimnus = about 1½ bushel.

At Harmene the army halted five days ; and now that they seemed to be so close to Hellas, the question how they were to reach home not empty-handed¹ presented itself more forcibly to their minds than heretofore. The conclusion they came to was to appoint a single general, since one man would be better able to handle the troops, by night or by day, than was possible while the generalship was divided. If secrecy were desirable, it would be easier to keep matters dark, or if again expedition were an object, there would be less risk of arriving a day too late, since mutual explanations would be avoided, and whatever approved itself to the single judgment would at once be carried into effect, whereas previously the generals had done everything in obedience to the opinion of the majority.

With these ideas working in their minds, they turned to Xenophon, and the officers came to him and told him that this was how the soldiers viewed matters ; and each of them, displaying a warmth of kindly feeling, pressed him to accept the office. Xenophon partly would have liked to do so, in the belief that by so doing he would win to himself a higher repute in the esteem of his friends, and that his name would be reported to the city written large ; and by some stroke of fortune he might even be the discoverer of some blessing to the army collectively.

These and the like considerations elated him ; he had a strong desire to hold the supreme command. But then again, as he turned the matter over, the conviction deepened in his mind that the issue of the future is to every man uncertain ; and hence there was the risk of losing perhaps such reputation as he had already acquired. He was in sore straits, and, not knowing how to decide, it seemed best to him to lay the matter before heaven.² Accordingly, he led two victims to the altar and made sacrifice to Zeus the King, for it was he and no other who had been named by the oracle at Delphi,³ and his belief was that the vision⁴ which he beheld when he first essayed to undertake the joint administration of the army was sent to him by that god. He also recalled to mind a circumstance which befell him still

¹ Or, "with something to the good" ; the phrase is colloquial.

² Or, "to lay bare his heart to heaven," an autobiographic passage.

³ See above. p. 68.

⁴ See above, p. 69.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

factionousness than when there were many, be assured that in choosing some other than me you will not find me factionous. I hold that whosoever sets up factionous opposition to his leader factiously opposes his own safety. While if you determine to choose me, I should not be surprised were that choice to entail upon you and me the resentment of other people."

After those remarks on Xenophon's part, many more got up, one after another, insisting on the propriety of his undertaking the command. One of them, Agasias the Stymphalian, said: It was really ridiculous, if things had come to this pass that the Lacedaemonians are to fly in a rage because a number of friends have met together to dinner, and omitted to choose a Lacedaemonian to sit at the head of the table. "Really, if that is how matters stand," said he, "I do not see what right we have to be officers even, we who are only Arcadians." That sally brought down the plaudits of the assembly; and Xenophon, seeing that something more was needed, stepped forward again and spoke, "Pardon, sirs," he said, "let me make a clean breast of it. I swear to you by all the gods and goddesses; verily and indeed, I no sooner perceived your purpose, than I consulted the victims, whether it was better for you to entrust this leadership to me, and for me to undertake it, or the reverse. And the gods vouchsafed a sign to me so plain that even a common man¹ might understand it, and perceive that from such sovereignty I must needs hold myself aloof."

Under these circumstances they chose Cheirisophus, who, after his election, stepped forward and said: "Nay, sirs, be well assured of this, that had you chosen some one else, I for my part should not have set up factionous opposition. As to Xenophon, I believe you have done him a good turn by not appointing him; for even now Dexippus² has gone some way in traducing him to Anaxibius, as far as it lay in his power to do so, and that, in spite of my attempts to silence him. What he said was that he believed Xenophon would rather share the command of Clearchus's army with Timasion, a Dardanian, than with himself, a Laconian. But," continued Cheirisophus,

¹ Or, as we should say, a "layman."

² See above, p. 134; and below, pp. 190 foll.

“since your choice has fallen upon me, I will make it my endeavour to do you all the good in my power; so make your preparations to weigh anchor to-morrow; wind and weather permitting, we will voyage to Heraclea; every one must endeavour, therefore, to put in at that port; and for the rest we will consult, when we are come thither.”

11.—The next day they weighed anchor and set sail from Harmene with a fair breeze, two days' voyage along the coast. [As they coasted along they came in sight of Jason's beach,¹ where, as the story says, the ship Argo came to moorings; and then the mouths of the rivers, first the Thermodon, then the Iris, then the Halys, and next to it the Parthenius.] Coasting past [the latter], they reached Heraclea,² a Hellenic city and a colony of the Megarians, situated in the territory of the Mariandynians. So they came to anchorage off the Acherusian Chersonese, where Heracles³ is said to have descended to bring up the dog Cerberus, at a point where they still show the marks of his descent, a deep cleft more than two furlongs down. Here the Heracleots sent the Hellenes, as gifts of hospitality, three thousand measures⁴ of barley and two thousand jars of wine, twenty beeves and one hundred sheep. Through the flat country here flows the Lycus river, as it is called, about two hundred feet in breadth.

The soldiers held a meeting, and took counsel about the remainder of the journey: should they make their exit from the Pontus by sea or by land? and Lycon the Achaean got up and said: “I am astonished, sirs, that the generals do not endeavour to provide us more efficiently with provisions.

¹ I have left this passage in the text, although it involves, at first sight, a topographical error on the part of whoever wrote it, and Hug and other commentators regard it as spurious. Jason's beach (the modern Yasoûn Bouroun) and the three first-named rivers lie between Cotyora and Sinope. Possibly the author, or one of his editors, somewhat loosely inserted a recapitulatory note concerning the scenery of this coasting voyage at this point. “By the way, I ought to have told you that as they coasted along,” etc.

² One of the most powerful of commercial cities, distinguished as ἡ Ποντική, Pontica (whence, in the middle ages, Penteraklia), now Eregli. It was one of the older Greek settlements, and, like Kalchedon (to give that town its proper name), a Megaro-Doric colony. See Kiepert, op. cit. chap. iv. 62.

³ According to another version of the legend Heracles went down to bring up Cerberus, not here, but at Taenarum.

⁴ Lit. “three thousand medimni.” See above, p. 169, note 4.

These gifts of hospitality will not afford three days' victuals for the army; nor do I see from what region we are to provide ourselves as we march. My proposal, therefore, is to demand of the Heracleots at least three thousand cyzicenes."¹ Another speaker suggested "not less than ten thousand. Let us at once, before we break up this meeting, send ambassadors to the city and ascertain their answer to the demand and take counsel accordingly." Thereupon they proceeded to put up as ambassadors, first and foremost Cheirisophus, as he had been chosen general-in-chief; others also named Xenophon.

But both Cheirisophus and Xenophon stoutly declined, maintaining both alike that they could not compel a Hellenic city, actually friendly, to give anything which they did not spontaneously offer. So, since these two appeared to be backward, the soldiers sent Lycon the Achaean, Callimachus the Parrhasian, and Agasias the Stymphalian. These three went and announced the resolutions passed by the army. Lycon, it was said, even went so far as to threaten certain consequences in case they refused to comply. The Heracleots said they would deliberate; and, without more ado, they got together their goods and chattels from their farms and fields outside, and dismantled the market outside and transferred it within, after which the gates were closed, and arms appeared at the battlements of the walls.

At that check, the authors of these tumultuary measures fell to accusing the generals, as if they had marred the proceeding; and the Arcadians and Achaeans banded together, chiefly under the auspices of the two ringleaders, Callimachus the Parrhasian and Lycon the Achaean. The language they held was to this effect: It was outrageous that a single Athenian and a Lacedaemonian, who had not contributed a soldier to the expedition, should rule Peloponnesians;² scandalous that they themselves should bear the toils whilst others pocketed the spoils, and that too though the preservation of the army was due to themselves;

¹ Three thousand cyzicenes = about £3000. See above, p. 154, note 1.

² Reading with Hug καὶ Λακεδαιμόνιον . . . παρεχομένους κ.τ.λ. This seems preferable to the vulgate καὶ Λακεδαιμόνιων . . . παρεχόμενον. "that a single Athenian, who had not contributed, etc., should rule Peloponnesians and Lacedaemonians." The Lacedaemonian referred to is of course Cheirisophus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

hundred men, all heavy infantry. Secondly, Cheirisophus and his men, viz. one thousand four hundred heavy infantry and the seven hundred peltasts, or Clearchus's Thracians. Thirdly, Xenophon's division of one thousand seven hundred heavy infantry, and three hundred peltasts; but then he alone had the cavalry—about forty troopers.

The Arcadians, who had bargained with the Heracleots and got some vessels from them, were the first to set sail; they hoped, by pouncing suddenly on the Bithynians, to make as large a haul as possible. With that object they disembarked at Calpe Haven,¹ pretty nearly at a middle point in Thrace. Cheirisophus setting off straight from Heraclea, commenced a land march through the country; but having entered into Thrace, he preferred to cling to the seaboard, health and strength failing him. Xenophon, lastly, took vessels, and disembarking on the confines of Thrace and the Heracleotid, pushed forward through the heart of the country.²

III.—The Arcadians, disembarking under cover of night at Calpe Haven, marched against the nearest villages about thirty furlongs from the sea; and as soon as it was light, each of the ten generals led his company to attack one village, or if the village were large, a couple of companies advanced under their combined generals. They further agreed upon a certain knoll, where they were all eventually to assemble. So sudden was their attack that they seized a number of captives and enclosed a multitude of small cattle. But the Thracians who escaped began to collect again; for being light-armed troops they had slipped in large numbers through the hands of the heavy infantry; and now that they were got together they first attacked the company of the Arcadian general, Smicres, who had done his work and was retiring to the appointed meeting-place,³ driving along a large train of captives and cattle. For a good while the Hellenes maintained a running fight;¹ but at the passage of a gorge the enemy routed them, slaying Smicres himself and those with him to a man. The fate of another company under command of Hegesander, another of the ten, was nearly as bad; only eight men escaped, Hegesander being one of them. The remaining captains² eventually met, some with somewhat to show for their pains, others empty-handed.

¹ The Haven of Calpe, Κάλπησ λιμήν = Kirpe Limán or Karpe in the modern maps. The name is interesting as being also the ancient name of the rock fortress of Gibraltar. See the Dict. of Geog. s. v.

² Some MSS. here read, "In the prior chapter will be found a description of the manner in which the absolute command of Cheirisophus was abruptly terminated and the army of the Hellenes broken up. The sequel will show how each of these divisions fared." The passage is probably one of those commentators' notes, with which we are now familiar.

³ Lit. "who was already retiring."

The Thracians, having achieved this success, kept up a continual shouting and clatter of conversation to one another during the night; but with day-dawn they marshalled themselves right round the knoll on which the Hellenes were encamped—both cavalry in large numbers and light-armed troops—while every minute the stream of new-comers grew greater. Then they commenced an attack on the heavy infantry in all security; for the Hellenes had not a single Bowman, javelinman, or mounted trooper amongst them; while the enemy rushed forward on foot or galloped up on horseback and let fly their javelins. It was vain to attempt to retaliate, so lightly did they spring back and escape; and ever the attack renewed itself from every point, so that on one side man after man was wounded, on the other not a soul was touched; the result being that they could not stir from their position, and the Thracians ended by cutting them off even from their water. In their despair they began to parley about a truce, and finally various concessions were made and terms agreed to between them; but the Thracians would not hear of giving hostages in answer to the demand of the Hellenes; at that point the matter rested.³ So fared it with the Arcadians.

As to Cheirisophus, that general prosecuted his march

¹ Lit. "marched and fought," as did the forlorn hope under Sir C. Wilson making its way from Abu Klea to the Nile in Jan. 1885.

² "Captains" λοχαγοί—so the MSS. read—but the emendation of Pantazides is almost certainly right λόχοι "companies." It will be recollected that the ten seceding Arcadian companies were led by ten separate "generals," στρατηγοί, of whom the ill-starred Smicres was one. Hug remarks that λόχωι and λοχαγῶν are apt to be confounded in the MSS., as e.g. below, p. 215, VII. iii. 46.

³ Or, "but when the terms were but all concluded, the Thracians refused to give the hostages which the Hellenes required, and there was nothing more to be done."

along the seaboard, and without check reached Calpe Haven. Xenophon advanced through the heart of the country ; and his cavalry pushing on in front, came upon some old men pursuing their road somewhither, who were brought to him, and in answer to his question, whether they had caught sight of another Hellenic army anywhere, told him all that had lately taken place, adding that at present they were being besieged upon a knoll with all the Thracians in close circle round them. Thereupon he kept the old men under strict guard to serve as guides in case of need ; next, having appointed outposts, he called a meeting of the soldiers, and addressed them : " Soldiers, some of the Arcadians are dead and the rest are being besieged upon a certain knoll. Now my own belief is, that if they are to perish, with their deaths the seal is set to our own fate : since we must reckon with an enemy at once numerous and emboldened. Clearly our best course is to hasten to their rescue, if haply we may find them still alive, and do battle by their side rather than suffer isolation, confronting danger single-handed.

" Let us then at once push forward as far as may seem opportune till supper-time, and then encamp. As long as we are marching, let Timasion, with the cavalry, gallop on in front, but without losing sight of us ; and let him examine all closely in front, so that nothing may escape our observation." (At the same time too, he sent out some nimble fellows of the light-armed troops to the flanks and to the high tops, who were to give a signal if they espied anything anywhere ; ordering them to burn everything inflammable which lay in their path.)¹ " As for ourselves," he continued, " we need not look to find cover in any direction ; for it is a long step back to Heraclea and a long leap across to Chrysopolis, and the enemy is at the door. The shortest road is to Calpe Haven, where we suppose Cheirisophus, if safe, to be ; but then, when we get there, at Calpe Haven there are no vessels for us to sail away in ; and if we stop here, we have not provisions for a single day. Suppose the beleaguered Arcadians left to their fate, we shall find it but a sorry alternative to run the gauntlet with Cheiri-

¹ Hug, following Rehdantz, inserts this paragraph at the end of the speech, which it somewhat interrupts, after the words " he led the way " below.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

before they made off, but in what direction, they could not say.

On hearing this, Xenophon's troops first breakfasted, and then getting their kit together began their march, desiring to unite with the rest at Calpe's Haven without loss of time. As they continued their march, they came across the track of the Arcadians and Achaeans along the road to Calpe, and both divisions arriving eventually at the same place, were overjoyed to see one another again, and they embraced each other like brothers. Then the Arcadians inquired of Xenophon's officers—why they had quenched the watch-fires? "At first," said they, "when we lost sight of your watch-fires, we expected you to attack the enemy in the night; and the enemy, so at least we imagined,¹ must have been afraid of that and so set off. The time at any rate at which they set off would correspond. But when the requisite time had elapsed and you did not come, we concluded that you must have learnt what was happening to us, and in terror had made a bolt for it to the seaboard.² We resolved not to be left behind by you; and that is how we also came to march hither."

iv.—During this day they contented themselves with bivouacking there on the beach at the harbour. The place which goes by the name of Calpe Haven is in Asiatic Thrace, the name given to a region extending from the mouth of the Euxine all the way to Heraclea, which lies on the right hand as you sail into the Euxine. It is a long day's voyage for a war-ship, using her three banks of oars, from Byzantium to Heraclea, and between these two there is not a single Hellenic or friendly city, but only these Bithynian Thracians, who have a bad reputation for the savagery with which they treat any Hellenes cast ashore by shipwreck or otherwise thrown into their power.

Now the haven of Calpe lies exactly midway, halving the voyage between Byzantium and Heracleia. It is a long promontory running out into the sea; the seaward portion being a rocky precipice, at no point less than twenty fathoms³ high; but on the landward side there is a neck about four hundred feet wide ; and the space inside the neck is capable of accommodating ten thousand inhabitants, and there is a haven immediately under the crag with a beach facing the west. Then there is a copious spring of fresh water flowing on the very marge of the sea¹ commanded by the stronghold. Again, there is plenty of wood of various sorts ; but most plentiful of all, fine shipbuilding timber down to the very edge of the sea. The upland stretches into the heart of the country for twenty furlongs at least. It is good loamy soil, free from stones. For a still greater distance the seaboard is thickly grown with large timber trees of every description. The surrounding country is beautiful and spacious, containing numerous well populated villages. The soil produces barley and wheat, and pulse of all sorts, millet and sesame, figs in ample supply, with numerous vines producing sweet wines, and indeed everything else except olives. Such is the character of the country.

¹ Or, "We imagined," lit. "as we at least imagined."

² Or, "had made off in terror to the seaboard," i.e. like runaway slaves skulking into hiding.

³ Or, "one hundred and twenty feet."

The tents were pitched on the seaward-facing beach, the soldiers being altogether averse to camping on ground which might so easily be converted into a city. Indeed, their arrival at the place at all seemed very like the crafty design of some persons who were minded to found a city. The aversion was not unnatural, since the majority of the soldiers had not left their homes on so long a voyage from scantiness of subsistence, but attracted by the fame of Cyrus's virtues ; some of them bringing followers, while others had expended money on the expedition. And amongst them was a third set who had run away from fathers and mothers ; while a different class had left children behind, hoping to return to them with money or other gains. Other people with Cyrus won great success, they were told ;² why should it not be so with them ? Being persons then of this description, the one longing of their hearts was to reach Hellas safely.

It was on the day after their meeting that Xenophon sacrificed as a preliminary to a military expedition ; for it was needful to march out in search of provisions, besides which he designed burying the dead. As soon as the victims proved favourable they all set out, the Arcadians following¹ with the rest. The majority of the dead, who had lain already five days, they buried just where they had fallen, in groups; to remove their bodies now would have been impossible. Some few, who lay off the roads, they got together and buried with what splendour they could, considering the means in their power. Others they could not find, and for these they erected a great cenotaph,² and covered it with wreaths. When it was all done, they returned home to camp. At that time they supped, and went to rest.

¹ Or, "Within easy reach of the haven ; plenty of wood of various sorts, most especially fine shipbuilding timber," etc.

² I.e. "his society was itself a passport to good fortune."

Next day there was a general meeting of the soldiers, collected chiefly by Agasias the Stymphalian, a captain, and Hieronymus, an Eleian, also a captain, and other seniors of the Arcadians; and they passed a resolution that, for the future, whoever revived the idea of breaking up the army should be punished by death. And the army, it was decided, would now resume its old position under the command of its former generals. Though Cheirisophus, indeed, had already died under medical treatment for fever;³ and Neon the Asinaean had taken his place.

After these resolutions Xenophon got up and said: "Soldiers, the journey must now, I presume, be conducted on foot; indeed this is clear, since we have no vessels; and we are driven to commence it at once, for we have no provisions if we stop. We then," he continued, "will sacrifice, and you must prepare yourselves to fight now, if ever, for the spirit of the enemy has revived."⁴

Thereupon the generals sacrificed, in the presence of the Arcadian seer, Arexion; for Silanus the Ambraciot had chartered a vessel at Heraclea and made his escape ere this.

¹ I.e. in the cortège.

² "Cenotaph," i.e. "an empty tomb." The word is interesting as occurring only in Xenophon, until we come to the writers of the kourḗ or common dialect. Compare ὑοσκύαμος, "hyuscyamus," bogbean, our henbane, which we also owe to Xenophon. Oecon. i. 13, see Sauppe, Lexil. Xen. s. vv.

³ This I take to be the meaning of the words, which are necessarily ambiguous, since φάρμακον, "a drug," also means "poison." Did Cheirisophus conceivably die of fever brought on by some poisonous draught? or did he take poison whilst suffering from fever? or did he die under treatment?

⁴ I.e. "his courage is at the flood."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

hearing this proposal, cried out, "No need to take us inside that place; better sacrifice with all speed." Now sheep there were none any longer. So they purchased oxen from under a wagon and sacrificed; and Xenophon begged Cleanor the Arcadian to superintend the sacrifice on his behalf, in case there might be some change now. But even so there was no improvement.

Now Neon was general in place of Cheirisophus, and seeing the men suffering so cruelly from want, he was willing to do them a good turn. So he got hold of some Heracleot or other who said he knew of villages close by from which they could get provisions, and proclaimed by herald: "If any one liked to come out and get provisions, be it known that he, Neon, would be their leader." So out came the men with spears, and wine skins and sacks and other vessels—two thousand strong in all. But when they had reached the villages and began to scatter for the purpose of foraging, Pharnabazus's cavalry were the first to fall upon them. They had come to the aid of the Bithynians, wishing, if possible, in conjunction with the latter, to hinder the Hellenes from entering Phrygia. These troopers killed no less than five hundred of the men; the rest fled for their lives up into the hill country.

News of the catastrophe was presently brought into camp by one of those who had escaped, and Xenophon, seeing that the victims had not been favourable on that day, took a wagon bullock, in the absence of other sacrificial beasts, offered it up, and started for the rescue, he and the rest under thirty years of age¹ to the last man. Thus they picked up the remnant of Neon's party and returned to camp. It was now about sunset; and the Hellenes in deep despondency were making their evening meal, when all of a sudden, through bush and brake, a party of Bithynians fell upon the pickets, cutting down some and chasing the rest into camp. In the midst of screams and shouts the Hellenes ran to their arms, one and all; yet to pursue or move the camp in the night seemed hardly safe, for the ground was thickly grown with bush; all they could do was to strengthen the outposts and keep watch under arms the livelong night.

v.—And so they spent the night, but with day-dawn the generals led the way into the natural fastness, and the others picked up their arms and baggage and followed the lead. Before the breakfast-hour arrived, they had fenced off with a ditch the only side on which lay ingress into the place, and had palisaded off the whole, leaving only three gates. Anon a ship from Heraclea arrived bringing barleymeal, victim animals, and wine.

¹ Some MSS. give "fifty," but "thirty" is more likely to be right.

Xenophon was up betimes, and made the usual offering before starting on an expedition, and at the first victim the sacrifice was favourable. Just as the sacrifice ended, the seer, Arexion the Parrhasian, caught sight of an eagle, which boded well, and bade Xenophon lead on. So they crossed the trench and grounded arms. Then proclamation was made by herald for the soldiers to breakfast and start on an expedition under arms; the mob of sutlers and the captured slaves would be left in camp. Accordingly the mass of the troops set out. Neon alone remained; for it seemed best to leave that general and his men to guard the contents of the camp. But when the officers and soldiers had left them¹ in the lurch, they were so ashamed to stop in camp while the rest marched out, that they too set out, leaving only those above five-and-forty years of age.

These then stayed, while the rest set out on the march. Before they had gone two miles, they stumbled upon dead bodies, and when they had brought up the rear of the column in a line with the first bodies to be seen, they began digging graves and burying all included in the column from end to end. After burying the first batch, they advanced, and again bringing the rear even with the first unburied bodies which appeared, they buried in the same way all which the line of troops included. Finally, reaching the road that led out of the villages where the bodies lay thick together, they collected them and laid them in a common grave.

It was now about midday, when pushing forward the troops up to the villages² without entering them, they proceeded to seize provisions, laying hands on everything they could set eyes

¹ Reading ἀπέλειπον αὐτοὺς; or, reading with Hug, ἀπέλειπον αὐτόν—
“but when his officers and soldiers were for leaving Neon in the lurch, as they were ashamed to stop in camp while the rest of the army marched out, the generals ended by leaving behind only those above five-and-forty years of age.”

² Or, “to the outer edge of the villages.”

on under cover of their lines ; when suddenly they caught sight of the enemy cresting certain hillocks in front of them, duly marshalled in line—a large body of cavalry and infantry. It was Spithridates and Rhathines, sent by Pharnabazus with their force at their backs. As soon as the enemy caught sight of the Hellenes, they stood still, about two miles distant. Then Arexion the seer sacrificed, and at the first essay the victims were favourable. Whereupon Xenophon addressed the other generals : “ I would advise, sirs, that we should detach one or more flying columns¹ to support our main attack, so that in case of need at any point we may have reserves in readiness to assist our main body, and the enemy, in the confusion of battle, may find himself attacking the unbroken lines of troops not hitherto engaged.” These views approved themselves to all. “ Do you then,” said he, “ lead on the vanguard straight at the enemy. Do not let us stand parleying here, now that we have caught sight of him and he of us. I will detach the hindmost companies in the way we have decided upon and follow you.” After that they quietly advanced, and he, withdrawing the rear-rank companies in three brigades consisting of a couple of hundred men apiece, commissioned the first on the right to follow the main body at the distance of a hundred feet. Samolas the Achaean was in command of this brigade. The duty of the second, under the command of Pyrrhias the Arcadian, was to follow in the centre. The last was posted on the left, with Phrasias, an Athenian, in command. As they advanced, the vanguard reached a large and difficult woody glen, and halted, not knowing whether the obstacle needed to be crossed or not. They passed down the word for the generals and officers to come forward to the front. Xenophon, wondering what it was that stopped the march, and presently hearing the above order passed along the ranks, rode up with all speed. As soon as they were met, Sophaenetus, as the eldest general, stated his opinion that the question, whether a gully of that kind ought to be crossed or not, was not worth discussing. Xenophon, with some ardour, retorted : “ You know, sirs, I have not been in the habit hitherto of introducing you to danger which you might avoid. It is not your reputation

¹ Or, “ reserve companies,” λῦχους φύλακας. See Mr. Pretor, ad loc.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

each man chanced to find himself. By this method, as it seemed to him, the troops would more quickly mass themselves on the far side than was possible, if they defiled along¹ the bridge which spanned the gully. But once across he passed along the line and addressed the troops: "Sirs, call to mind what by help of the gods you have already done. Bethink you of the battles you have won at close quarters with the foe; of the fate which awaits those who flee before their foes. Forget not that we stand at the very doors of Hellas. Follow in the steps of Heracles, our guide, and cheer each the other onwards by name."² Sweet were it surely by some brave and noble word or deed, spoken or done this day, to leave the memory of oneself in the hearts of those one loves."

These words were spoken as he rode past, and simultaneously he began leading on the troops in battle line; and, placing the peltasts on either flank of the main body, they moved against the enemy. Along the line the order had sped "to keep their spears at rest on the right shoulder until the bugle signal; then lower them for the charge, slow march, and even pace, no one to quicken into a run." Lastly, the watch-word was passed, "Zeus the Saviour, Heracles our Guide." The enemy waited their approach, confident in the excellence of his position; but as they drew closer the Hellene light troops, with a loud alala!³ without waiting for the order, dashed against the foe. The latter, on their side, came forward eagerly to meet the charge, both the cavalry and the mass of the Bithynians; and these turned the peltasts. But when with counter-wave the phalanx of the heavy infantry rapidly advancing, faced them, and at the same time the bugle sounded, and the battle hymn rose from all lips, and after this a loud cheer rose, and at the same instant they couched their spears;—at this conjuncture the enemy no longer welcomed them, but fled. Timasion with his cavalry followed close, and, considering their scant numbers, they did great execution. It was the left wing of the enemy, in a line with which the Hellene cavalry were posted, that was so speedily scattered.

¹ Lit. "had they wound off thread by thread"; the metaphor is from unwinding a ball of wool. ² Or, "forwards by his highest name."

³ Or, as we say, "With a loud hurrah."

But the right, which was not so hotly pursued, collected upon a knoll; and when the Hellenes saw them standing firm, it seemed the easiest and least dangerous course to go against them at once. Raising the battle hymn, they straightway fell upon them, but the others did not await their coming. Thereupon the peltasts gave chase until the right of the enemy was in its turn scattered, though with slight loss in killed; for the enemy's cavalry was numerous and threatening.

But when the Hellenes saw the cavalry of Pharnabazus still standing in compact order, and the Bithynian horsemen massing together as if to join it, and like spectators gazing down from a knoll at the occurrences below; though weary, they determined to attack the enemy as best they could, and not suffer him to recover breath with reviving courage. So they formed in compact line and advanced. Thereupon the hostile cavalry turned and fled down the steep as swiftly as if they had been pursued by cavalry.¹ In fact they sought the shelter of a gully, the existence of which was unknown to the Hellenes. The latter accordingly turned aside too soon and gave up the chase, for it was late. Returning to the point where the first encounter took place they erected a trophy, and went back to the sea about sunset. It was something like seven miles² to camp.

VI.—After this the enemy confined themselves to their own concerns, and removed their households and property as far away as possible. The Hellenes, on their side, were still awaiting the arrival of Cleander with the ships of war and transports, which ought to be there soon. So each day they went out with the baggage animals and slaves and fearlessly brought in wheat and barley, wine and vegetables, millet and figs; since the district produced all good things, the olive alone excepted. When the army stayed in camp to rest, pillaging parties were allowed to go out, and those who went out appropriated the spoils; but when the whole army went out, if any one went off apart and seized anything, it was voted to be public property. Ere long there was an ample abundance of supplies of all sorts, for marketables arrived from Hellenic cities on all sides, and marts were established. Mariners coasting by, and hearing that a city was being founded and that there was a harbour, were glad to put in. Even the hostile tribes dwelling in the neighbourhood presently began to send envoys to Xenophon. It was he who was forming the place into a city, as they understood, and they would be glad to learn on what terms they might secure his friendship. He made a point of introducing these visitors to the soldiers.

¹ Reading With Hug, ὥσπερ ὑπὸ ἱππέων διωκόμενοι, or, if ὥσπερ οἱ ὑπὸ (τῶν) ἱππέων διωκόμενοι; translate, "as if they would fain rival the agility of those who had been pursued by the cavalry," referring to Timasion's charge, described above.

² Lit. "sixty stades."

Meanwhile Cleander arrived with two ships of war, but not a single transport. At the moment of his arrival, as it happened, the army had taken the field, and a separate party had gone off on a pillaging excursion into the hills and had captured a number of small cattle. In their apprehension of being deprived of them, these same people spoke to Dexippus (this was the man who had made off from Trapezus with the fifty-oared galley), and urged him to save their sheep for them. "Take some for yourself," said they, "and give the rest back to us." So, without more ado, he drove off the soldiers standing near, who kept repeating that the spoil was public property. Then off he went to Cleander. "Here is an attempt," said he, "at robbery." Cleander bade him to bring up the culprit to him. Dexippus seized on some one, and was for haling him to the Spartan governor. Just then Agasias came across him and rescued the man, who was a member of his company; and the rest of the soldiers present set to work to stone Dexippus, calling him "traitor." Things looked so ill that a number of the crew of the ships of war took fright and fled to the sea, and with the rest Cleander himself. Xenophon and the other generals tried to hold the men back, assuring Cleander that the affair signified nothing at all, and that the origin of it was a decree passed by the army. That was to blame, if anything. But Cleander, goaded on by Dexippus, and personally annoyed at the fright which he had experienced, threatened to sail away and publish an interdict against them, forbidding any city to receive them,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

submit to undergo it. I further say that if any one else is accused, that man is bound to surrender himself to Cleander for judgment, for by this means you will be absolved entirely from the accusation. But as the matter now stands, it is cruel that just when we were aspiring to win praise and honour throughout Hellas, we are destined to sink below the level of the rest of the world, banned from the Hellenic cities whose common name we boast."

After him Agasias got up, and said: "I swear to you, sirs, by the gods and goddesses, verily and indeed, neither Xenophon nor any one else among you bade me rescue the man. I saw an honest man—one of my own company—being taken up by Dexippus, the man who betrayed you, as you know full well. That I could not endure; I rescued him, I admit the fact. Do not you deliver me up. I will surrender myself, as Xenophon suggests, to Cleander to pass what verdict on me he thinks right. Do not, for the sake of such a matter, make foes of the Lacedaemonians; rather God grant that¹ each of you may safely reach the goal of his desire. Only do you choose from among yourselves and send with me to Cleander those who, in case of any omission on my part, may by their words and acts supply what is lacking." Thereupon the army granted him to choose for himself whom he would have go with him and to go; and he at once chose the generals. After this they all set off to Cleander—Agasias and the generals and the man who had been rescued by Agasias—and the generals spoke as follows: "The army has sent us to you, Cleander, and this is their bidding: 'If you have fault to find with all, they say, you ought to pass sentence on all, and do with them what seems best; or if the charge is against one man or two, or possibly several, what they expect of these people is to surrender themselves to you for judgment.' Accordingly, if you lay anything to the charge of us generals, here we stand at your bar. Or do you impute the fault to some one not here? tell us whom. Short of flying in the face of our authority, there is no one who will absent himself"

At that point Agasias stepped forward and said: "It was I, Cleander, who rescued the man before you yonder from Dexippus, when the latter was carrying him off, and it was I who gave the order to strike Dexippus. My plea is that I know the prisoner to be an honest man. As to Dexippus, I know that he was chosen by the army to command a fifty-oared galley, which we had obtained by request from the men of Trapezus for the express purpose of collecting vessels to carry us safely home. But this same Dexippus betrayed his fellow-soldiers, with whom he had been delivered from so many perils, and made off into hiding like a runaway slave, whereby we have robbed the Trapezuntines of their frigate, and must needs appear as knaves in their eyes for this man's sake. As to ourselves, as far as he could, he has ruined us ; for, like the rest of us, he had heard how all but impossible it was for us to retreat by foot across the rivers and to reach Hellas in safety. That is the stamp of man whom I robbed of his prey. Now, had it been you yourself who carried him off, or one of your emissaries, or indeed any one short of a runaway from ourselves, be sure that I should have acted far otherwise. Be assured that if you put me to death at this time you are sacrificing a good, honest man for the sake of a coward and a scamp."

¹ Reading with the best MSS., σωζαίσθε. Agasias ends his sentence with a prayer. Al. σωζέσθε, "act so that each," etc.

When he had listened to these remarks, Cleander replied that if such had been the conduct of Dexippus he could not congratulate him. "But still," he added, turning to the generals, "were Dexippus ever so great a scamp he ought not to suffer violence ; but in the language of your own demand he was entitled to a fair trial, and so to obtain his deserts. What I have to say at present therefore is : leave your friend here and go your way, and when I give the order be present at the trial. I have no further charge against the army or any one, since the prisoner himself admits that he rescued the man." Then the man who had been rescued said : "In behalf of myself, Cleander, if possibly you think that I was being taken up for some misdeed, it is not so ; I neither struck nor shot ; I merely said, 'The sheep are public property ;' for it was a resolution of the soldiers that whenever the army went out as a body any booty privately obtained was to be public property. That was all I said, and thereupon yonder fellow seized me and began dragging me off. He wanted to stop our mouths, so that he might have a share of the things himself, and keep the rest for these buccaneers, contrary to the ordinance." In answer to that Cleander said: "Very well, if that is your disposition you can stay behind too, and we will take your case into consideration also."

Thereupon Cleander and his party proceeded to breakfast; but Xenophon collected the army in assembly, and advised their sending a deputation to Cleander to intercede in behalf of the men. Accordingly it was resolved to send some generals and officers with Dracontius the Spartan, and of the rest those who seemed best fitted to go. The deputation was to request Cleander by all means to release the two men. Accordingly Xenophon came and addressed him thus: "Cleander, you have the men; the army has bowed to you and assented to do what you wished with respect to these two members of their body and themselves in general. But now they beg and pray you to give up these two men, and not to put them to death. Many a good service have these two wrought for our army in past days. Let them but obtain this from you, and in return the army promises that, if you will put yourself at their head and the gracious gods approve, they will show you how orderly they are, how apt to obey their general, and, with heaven's help, to face their foes unflinchingly. They make this further request to you, that you will present yourself and take command of them and make trial of them. 'Test us ourselves,' they say, 'and test Dexippus, what each of us is like, and afterwards assign to each his due.'" When Cleander heard these things, he answered: "Nay, by the twin gods, I will answer you quickly enough. Here I make you a present of the two men, and I will as you say present myself, and then, if the gods vouchsafe, I will put myself at your head and lead you into Hellas. Very different is your language from the tale I used to hear concerning you from certain people, that you wanted to withdraw the army from allegiance to the Lacedaemonians."

After this the deputation thanked him and retired, taking with them the two men; then Cleander sacrificed as a preliminary to marching, and consorted friendly with Xenophon,

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

[In the earlier portion of the narrative will be found a detailed history of the fortunes of the Hellenes during their march up country with Cyrus down to the date of the battle ; and, subsequently to his death, until they reached the Euxine ; as also of all their doings in their efforts to escape from the Euxine, partly by land marches and partly under sail by sea, until they found themselves outside the mouth of the Black Sea (south of the Bosphorus) at Chrysopolis in Asia.]

1.—At this point Pharnabazus, who was afraid that the army might undertake a campaign against his satrapy, sent to Anaxibius, the Spartan high admiral, who chanced to be in Byzantium, and begged him to convey the army out of Asia, undertaking to comply with his wishes in every respect. Anaxibius accordingly sent to summon the generals and officers to Byzantium, and promised that the soldiers should not lack pay for service, if they crossed the strait. The officers said that they would deliberate and return an answer. Xenophon individually informed him that he was about to quit the army at once, and was only anxious to set sail. Anaxibius pressed him not to be in so great a hurry : “Cross over with the rest,” he said, “and then it will be time enough to think about quitting the army.”¹ This the other undertook to do.

Now Seuthes the Thracian sent Medosades and begged Xenophon to use his influence to get the army across. “Tell Xenophon, if he will do his best for me in this matter, he will not regret it.” Xenophon answered : “The army is in any case going to cross ; so that, as far as that is concerned,

¹ Or, more lit., “Anaxibius pressed him to wait and cross over with the rest ; when,” said he, “it will be time enough,” etc.

Seuthes is under no obligation to me or to any one else ; but as soon as it is once across, I personally shall be quit of it. Let Seuthes therefore, as far as he may deem consistent with prudence, apply to those who are going to remain and will have a voice in affairs."

After this the whole body of troops crossed to Byzantium. But Anaxibius, instead of proceeding to give pay, made proclamation that, "The soldiers were to take up their arms and baggage and go forth," as if all he wished were to ascertain their numbers and bid them god-speed at the same moment. The soldiers were not well pleased at that, because they had no money to furnish themselves with provisions for the march ; and they sluggishly set about getting their baggage together. Xenophon meanwhile, being on terms of intimacy with the governor, Cleander, came to pay his host a final visit, and bid him adieu, being on the point of setting sail. But the other protested ; "Do not do so, or else," said he, "you will be blamed, for even now certain people are disposed to hold you to account because the army is so slow in getting under weigh." The other answered, "Nay, I am not to blame for that. It is the men themselves, who are in want of provisions ; that is why they are out of heart at their exodus." "All the same," he replied, "I advise you to go out, as if you intended to march with them, and when you are well outside, it will be time enough to take yourself off." "Well then," said Xenophon, "we will go and arrange all this with Anaxibius." They went and stated the case to the admiral, who insisted that they must do as he had said, and march out, bag and baggage, by the quickest road ; and as an appendix to the former edict, he added, "Any one absenting himself from the review and the muster will have himself to blame for the consequences." This was peremptory. So out marched, the generals first, and then the rest ; and now, with the exception of here a man and there, they were all outside ; it was 'a clean sweep ;' and Eteonicus stood posted near the gates, ready to close them, as soon as the men were fairly out, and to thrust in the bolt pin.

Then Anaxibius summoned the generals and captains, and addressed them : "Provisions you had better get from the Thracian villages ; you will find plenty of barley, wheat, and other necessities in them ; and when you have got them, off with you to the ^{rs n}, where Cyniscus will take you into his service.” ^{Some of} ^{ese} the soldiers overheard what was said, or possibly one of the officers was the medium of communication ; however it was, the news was handed on to the army. As to the generals, their immediate concern was to try and gain some information as to Seuthes : “ Was he hostile or friendly ? also, would they have to march through the Sacred mountain,¹ or round about through the middle of Thrace ? ”

While they were discussing these points, the soldiers snatched up their arms and made a rush full speed at the gates, with the intention of getting inside the fortification again. But Eteonicus and his men, seeing the heavy infantry coming up at a run promptly closed the gates and thrust in the bolt pin.² Then the soldiers fell to battering the gates, exclaiming that it was iniquitous to thrust them forth in this fashion into the jaws of their enemies. “ If you do not of your own accord open the gates,” they cried, “ we will split them in half ” ; and another set rushed down to the sea, and so along the break-water and over the wall into the city ; while a third set, consisting of those few who were still inside, having never left the city, seeing the affair at the gates, severed the bars with axes and flung the portals wide open ; and the rest came pouring in.

Xenophon, seeing what was happening, was seized with alarm lest the army should betake itself to pillage, and ills incurable be wrought to the city, to himself and to the soldiers. Then he set off, and, plunging into the throng, was swept through the gates with the crowd. The Byzantines no sooner saw the soldiers forcibly rushing in than they left the open square, and fled, some to the shipping, others to their homes, while those already indoors came racing out, and some fell to dragging down their ships of war, hoping possibly to be safe on board these ; while there was not a soul who

¹ So the mountain-range is named which runs parallel to the Propontis (Sea of Marmora) from lat. 41° N. circa to lat. 40° 30' ; from Bisanthe (Rhodosto) to the neck of the Chersonese (Gallipoli).

² Or, “ closed and barred the gates.” See Thuc. ii. 4.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

than a thousand talents.¹ Our empire included all the islands, and we were possessed of numerous cities both in Asia and in Europe. Amongst others, this very Byzantium, where we now are, was ours; and yet in the end we were vanquished, as you all very well know.

“What, must we anticipate, will now be our fate? The Lacedaemonians have not only their old allies, but the Athenians and those who were at that time allies of Athens are added to them. Tissaphernes and all the rest of the Asiatics on the seaboard are our foes, not to speak of our arch-enemy, the king himself, up yonder, whom we came to deprive of his empire, and to kill, if possible. I ask then, with all these banded together against us, is there any one so insensate as to imagine that we can survive the contest? For heaven’s sake, let us not go mad or loosely throw away our lives in war with our own native cities—nay, our own friends, our kith and our kin; for in one or other of the cities they are all included. Every city will march against us, and not unjustly, if, after refusing to hold one single barbarian city by right of conquest, we seize the first Hellenic city that we come to and make it a ruinous heap. For my part, my prayer is that before I see such things wrought by you, I, at any rate, may lie ten thousand fathoms under ground! My counsel to you, as Hellenes, is to try and obtain your just rights, through obedience to those who stand at the head of Hellas; and if so be that you fail in those demands, why, being more sinned against than sinning, need we rob ourselves of Hellas too? At present, I propose that we should send to Anaxibius and tell him that we have made an entrance into the city, not meditating violence, but merely to discover if he and his will show us any good; for if so, it is well; but if otherwise, at least we will let him see that he does not shut the door upon us as dupes and fools. We know the meaning of discipline;² we turn our backs and go.”

This resolution was passed, and they sent Hieronymus an Eleian, with two others, Eurylochus an Arcadian and Philesius an Achaean, to deliver the message. So these set off on their errand. But while the soldiers were still seated in conclave,

¹ £240,000.

² Or, “We choose to obey and go.”

Coeratadas,¹ of Thebes, arrived. He was a Theban not in exile, but with a taste for generalship, who made it his business to go the round of Hellas to see if any city or nation were in need of his services. Thus, on the present occasion, he presented himself, and begged to state that he was ready to put himself at their head, and lead them into the Delta of Thrace,² as it is called, where they would find themselves in a land of plenty ; but until they got there, he would provide them with meat and drink enough and to spare. While they were still listening to this tale, the return message from Anaxibius came. His answer was : " The discipline, they had spoken of, was not a thing they would regret ; indeed he would report their behaviour to the authorities at home ; and for himself, he would take advice and do the best he could for them."

Thereupon the soldiers accepted Coeratadas as their general, and retired without the walls. Their new general undertook to present himself to the troops next day with sacrificial beasts and a soothsayer, with eatables also and drinkables for the army. Now, as soon as they were gone out, Anaxibius closed the gates and issued a proclamation to the effect that " any of the soldiers caught inside should be knocked down to the hammer and sold at once." Next day, Coeratadas arrived with the victims and the soothsayer. A string of twenty bearers bearing barleymeal followed at his heels, succeeded by other twenty carrying wine, and three laden with a supply of olives, and two others carrying, the one about as much garlic as a single man could lift, and the other a similar load of onions. These various supplies he set down, apparently for distribution, and proceeded to sacrifice.

Now Xenophon sent to Cleander, begging him to arrange matters so that he might be allowed to enter the walls, with a view to starting from Byzantium on his homeward voyage.

¹ See Hell. I. iii. 16 foll., for an earlier passage in the life of this same person, since it seems there is little doubt they are the same.

² The exact locality, so called, is not known ; doubtless it lay somewhere between Byzantium and Salmydessus, possibly at Delcus (mod. Derkos) ; or possibly the narrow portion of Thrace between the Euxine, Bosphorus, and Propontis went by this name. See note in Pretor ad loc., and Dict. Geog. " Thracia."

Cleander came, and this is what he said: "I have come; but I was barely able to arrange what you want. Anaxibius insisted: 'It was not convenient that Xenophon should be inside while the soldiers are close to the walls without; the Byzantines at sixes and sevens moreover; and no love lost between the one party of them and the other.' Still, he ended by bidding you to come inside, if you were really minded to leave the town by sea with himself." Accordingly Xenophon bade the soldiers good-bye, and returned with Cleander within the walls.

To return to Coeratadas. The first day he failed to get favourable signs at the sacrifice, and never a dole of rations did he make to the soldiers. On the second day the victims were standing ready near the altar, and so was Coeratadas, with chaplet crowned, all ready to sacrifice, when up comes Timasion the Dardanian, with Neon the Asinaean, and Cleanor of Orchomenus, forbidding Coeratadas to sacrifice: 'He must understand there was an end to his generalship, unless he gave them provisions.' The other bade them measure out the supplies, "Pray, dole them out." But when he found that he had a good deal short of a single day's provisions for each man, he picked up his paraphernalia of sacrifice and withdrew. As to being general, he would have nothing more to say to it.

II.—Now these five were left—Neon the Asinaean, Phryniscus the Achaean, Philesius the Achaean, Xanthicles the Achaean, Timasion the Dardanian—at the head of the army, and they pushed on to some villages of the Thracians facing Byzantium, and there encamped. Now the generals could not agree. Cleanor and Phryniscus wished to march to join Seuthes, who had worked upon their feelings by presenting one with a horse and the other with a woman to wife. But Neon's object was to come to the Chersonese: "When we are under the wing of the Lacedaemonians," he thought, "I shall step to the front and command the whole army."

Timasion's one ambition was to cross back again into Asia, hoping to be reinstated at home and end his exile. The soldiers shared the wishes of the last general. But, as time dragged on, many of the men sold their arms at different places and set sail as best they could; others [actually gave

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

But Seuthes, hearing that Xenophon had arrived, sent Medosades again, by sea to meet him, and begged him to bring the army to him; and whatever he thought would make his speech persuasive, he was ready to promise him. But the other replied, that none of these things were open to him to do; and with this answer Medosades departed, and the Hellenes proceeded to Perinthus.¹ Here on arrival Neon withdrew his troops and encamped apart, having about eight hundred men; while the remainder of the army lay in one place under the walls of Perinthus.

After this, Xenophon set himself to find vessels, so as to lose no time in crossing. But in the interval Aristarchus, the governor from Byzantium, arrived with a couple of war ships, being moved to do so by Pharnabazus. To make doubly sure, he first forbade the skippers and shipmasters to carry the troops across, and then he visited the camp and informed the soldiers that their passage into Asia was forbidden. Xenophon replied that he was acting under the orders of Anaxibius, who had sent him thither for this express purpose; to which Aristarchus retorted, "For the matter of that, Anaxibius is no longer admiral, and I am governor in this quarter; if I catch any of you at sea, I will sink you." With these remarks he retired within the walls of Perinthus.

Next day, he sent for the generals and officers of the army. They had already reached the fortification walls, when some one brought word to Xenophon that if he set foot inside, he would be seized, and either meet some ill fate there or more likely be delivered up to Pharnabazus. On hearing this Xenophon sent forward the rest of the party, but for himself pleaded that there was a sacrifice which he wished to offer. In this way he contrived to turn back and consult the victims, "Would the gods allow him to try and bring the army over to Seuthes?" On the one hand it was plain that the idea of crossing over to Asia in the face of this man with his ships of war, who meant to bar the passage, was too dangerous. Nor did he altogether like the notion of being blocked up in the Chersonese with an army in dire need of everything; where, besides being at the beck and call of the governor of the place, they would be debarred from the necessities of life.

¹ Lit. "When the Hellenes had reached Perinthus, Neon," etc. The interview with Medosades took place at Selymbria. See below, p. 207.

While Xenophon was thus employed, the generals and officers came back with a message from Aristarchus, who had told them they might retire for the present, but in the afternoon he should expect them. The former suspicions of a plot had now ripened to a certainty. Xenophon meantime had ascertained that the victims were favourable to his project. He personally, and the army as a whole, might with safety proceed to Seuthes, they seemed to say. Accordingly, he took with him Polycrates, the Athenian captain, and from each of the generals, not including Neon, some one man whom they could in each case trust, and in the night they set off to visit the army of Seuthes, sixty furlongs¹ distant.

As they approached, they came upon some deserted watch-fires, and their first impression was that Seuthes had shifted his position; but presently perceiving a confused sound (the voices of Seuthes' people signalling to one another), the explanation dawned on him: Seuthes kept his watch-fires kindled in front of, instead of behind, his night pickets, in order that the outposts, being in the dark, might escape notice, their numbers and position being thus a mystery; whilst any party approaching from the outside, so far from escaping notice, would, through the glare of the fire, stand out conspicuously. Perceiving how matters stood, Xenophon sent forward his interpreter, who was one of the party, and bade him inform Seuthes that Xenophon was there and craved conference with him. The others asked if he were an Athenian from the army yonder, and no sooner had the interpreter replied, "Yes, the same," than up they leapt and galloped off; and in less time than it takes to tell a couple of hundred peltasts had come up who seized and carried off Xenophon and those with him and brought them to Seuthes. The latter was in a tower right well guarded, and there were horses round it in a circle, standing all ready bitted and bridled; for his alarm was so great that he gave his horses their provender during the day,² and during the nights he kept watch and ward with the brutes thus bitted and bridled. It was stated in explanation that in old days an ancestor of his, named Teres, had been in this very country with a large army, several of whom he had lost at the hands of the native inhabitants, besides being robbed of his baggage train. The inhabitants of the country are Thynians, and they are reputed to be far the most warlike set of fighters—especially at night.

¹ Lit. "sixty stades," between seven and eight miles.

² I.e. "instead of letting them graze."

When they drew near, Seuthes bade Xenophon enter, and bring with him any two he might choose. As soon as they were inside, they first greeted one another warmly, and then, according to the Thracian custom, pledged themselves in bowls of wine. There was further present at the elbow of Seuthes, Medosades, who on all occasions acted as his ambassador-in-chief. Xenophon took the initiative and spoke as follows: "You have sent to me, Seuthes, once and again. On the first occasion you sent Medosades yonder, to Chalcedon, and you begged me to use my influence in favour of the army crossing over from Asia. You promised me, in return for this conduct on my part, various kindnesses; at least that is what Medosades stated"; and before proceeding further he turned to Medosades and asked, "Is not that so?" The other assented. "Again, on a second occasion, the same Medosades came when I had crossed over from Parium to rejoin the army; and he promised me that if I would bring you the army, you would in various respects treat me as a friend and brother. He said especially with regard to certain seaboard places of which you are the owner and lord, that you were minded to make me a present of them." At this point he again questioned Medosades, "Whether the words attributed to him were exact?" and Medosades once more fully assented. "Come now," proceeded Xenophon, "recount what answer I made you, and first at Chalcedon." "You answered that the army was, in any case, about to cross over to Byzantium; and as far as that went, there was no need to pay you or any one else anything; and for yourself, you added, that once across you were minded to leave the army, which thing came to pass even as you said."

¹ Or, "who far above all other tribes have the reputation of being most formidable foes at night," as Mr. Pretor suggests.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

my petition, he gave me the men and the horses which you will see at break of day, and nowadays I live with these, pillaging my own ancestral land. But if you would join me, I think, with the help of heaven, we might easily recover my empire. That is what I want of you." "Well then," said Xenophon, "supposing we came, what should you be able to give us? the soldiers, the officers, and the generals? Tell us that these witnesses may report your answer." And he promised to give "to the common soldiers a cyzicene,¹ to a captain twice as much,² and to a general four times as much,³ with as much land as ever they liked, some yoke of oxen, and a fortified place upon the seaboard." "But now supposing," said Xenophon, "we fail of success, in spite of our endeavours; suppose any intimidation on the part of the Lacedaemonians should arise; will you receive into your country any of us who may seek to find a refuge with you?" He answered: "Nay, not only so, but I shall look upon you as my brothers, entitled to share my seat, and the joint possessors of all the wealth which we may be able to acquire. And to you yourself, O Xenophon! I will give my daughter, and if you have a daughter, I will buy her in Thracian fashion; and I will give you Bisanthe as a dwelling-place, which is the fairest of all my possessions on the seaboard."⁴

III.—After listening to these proposals, they gave and accepted pledges of good faith; and so the deputation rode off. Before day they were back again in camp, and severally rendered a report to those who sent them. At dawn Aristarchus again summoned the generals and officers, but the latter resolved to have done with the visit to Aristarchus, and to summon a meeting of the army. In full conclave the soldiers met, with the exception of Neon's men, who remained about ten furlongs off. When they were met together Xenophon rose, and made the following announcement: "Men, Aristarchus with his ships of war hinders us from sailing where we fain

¹ A cyzicene monthly is to be understood. See above, p. 154, note 1.

² Lit. "a dimoiria, or double share."

³ Lit. "a tetramoiria, or a fourfold portion."

⁴ Bisanthe, one of the Ionic colonies founded by Samos, with the Thracian name Rhaedestus (now Rodosto), strongly placed so as to command the entrance into the Sacred mountain. See above, p. 198, note 1.

would go ; it is not even safe to set foot on board a vessel. But if he hinders us here, he hastens us there. ‘Be off to the Chersonese,’ says he, ‘force a passage through the Sacred mountain.’ If we master it and succeed in getting to the place, he has something in store for us. He promises that he will not sell you any more, as he did at Byzantium ; you shall not be cheated again ; you shall have pay ; he will no longer, as now, suffer you to remain in want of provisions. That is his proposal. But Seuthes says that if you will go to him he will treat you well. What you have now to consider is, whether you will stay to debate this question, or leave its settlement till we have gone up into a land of provisions. If you ask me my opinion, it is this : Since here we have neither money to buy, nor leave to take without money what we need, why should we not go up into these villages where the right to help ourselves is conferred by might ? There, unhampered by the want of bare necessities, you can listen to what this man and the other wants of you and choose whichever sounds best. Let those,” he added, “who agree to this, hold up their hands.” They all held them up. “Retire then,” said he, “and get your kit together, and at the word of command, follow your leader.”

After this, Xenophon put himself at the head and the rest followed. Neon, indeed, and other agents from Aristarchus tried to turn them from their purpose, but to their persuasions they turned a deaf ear. They had not advanced much more than three miles,¹ when Seuthes met them ; and Xenophon, seeing him, bade him ride up. He wished to tell him what they felt to be conducive to their interests, and in the presence of as many witnesses as possible. As soon as he had approached, Xenophon said : “We are going where the troops will have enough to live upon ; when we are there, we will listen to you and to the emissaries of the Laconian, and choose between you both whatever seems best. If then you will lead us where provisions are to be got in plenty, we shall feel indebted to you for your hospitality.” And Seuthes answered : “For the matter of that, I know many villages, close-packed and stocked with all kinds of provisions, just far enough off to give you a good appetite for your breakfasts.” “Lead on then!” said Xenophon. When they had reached the villages in the afternoon, the soldiers met, and Seuthes made the following speech: “My request to you, sirs, is that you will take the field with me, and my promise to you is that I will give every man of you a cyzicene,¹ and to the officers and generals at the customary rate; besides this I will honour those who show special merit. Food and drink you will get as now for yourselves from the country; but whatever is captured, I shall claim to have myself, so that by distribution of it I may provide you with pay. Let them flee, let them creep into hiding-places, we shall be able to pursue after them, we will track them out;² or if they resist, along with you we will endeavour to subdue them to our hands.” Xenophon inquired: “And how far from the sea shall you expect the army to follow you?” “Nowhere more than seven days’ journey,” he answered, “and in many places less.”

¹ Lit. “thirty stades.”

After this, permission was given to all who wished to speak, and many spoke, but ever to one and the same tune: “What Seuthes said, was very right. It was winter, and for a man to sail home, even if he had the will to do so, was impossible. On the other hand, to continue long in a friendly country, where they must depend upon what they could purchase, was equally beyond their power. If they were to wear away time and support life in a hostile country, it was safer to do so with Seuthes than by themselves, not to speak of all these good things; but if they were going to get pay into the bargain, that indeed was a godsend.” To complete the proceedings, Xenophon said: “If any one opposes the measure, let him state his views; if not, let the officer put the proposition to the vote.” No one opposed; they put it to the vote, and the resolution was carried; and without loss of time, he informed Seuthes that they would take the field with him.

After this the troops messed in their separate divisions, but the generals and officers were invited by Seuthes to dinner at a neighbouring village which was in his possession. When they were at the doors, and on the point of stepping

¹ See above, p. 154, note 1.

² Or, “nose” them out. See above, p. 155, note 1.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

As soon as the company, consisting of the most powerful Thracians there present, with the generals and captains of the Hellenes, and any embassy from a state which might be there, had arrived, they were seated in a circle, and the dinner was served. Thereupon three-legged stools were brought in and placed in front of the assembled guests. They were laden with pieces of meat, piled up, and there were huge leavened-loaves fastened on to the pieces of meat with long skewers. The tables, as a rule, were set beside the guests at intervals. That was the custom; and Seuthes set the fashion of the performance. He took up the loaves which lay by his side and broke them into little pieces, and then threw the fragments here to one and there to another as seemed him good; and so with the meat likewise, leaving for himself the merest taste. Then the rest fell to following the fashion set them, those that is who had tables placed beside them.

Now there was an Arcadian, Arystas by name, a huge eater; he soon got tired of throwing the pieces about, and seized a good three-quartern loaf in his two hands, placed some pieces of meat upon his knees, and proceeded to discuss his dinner. Then beakers of wine were brought round, and every one partook in turn; but when the cupbearer came to Arystas and handed him the bowl, he looked up, and seeing that Xenophon had done eating: "Give it him," quoth he, "he is more at leisure. I have something better to do at present." Seuthes, hearing a remark, asked the cupbearer what was said, and the cupbearer, who knew how to talk Greek, explained. Then followed a peal of laughter.

When the drinking had advanced somewhat, in came a Thracian with a white horse, who snatched the brimming bowl and said: "Here's a health to thee, O Seuthes! Let me present thee with this horse. Mounted on him, thou shalt capture whom thou choolest to pursue, or retiring from battle, thou shalt not dread the foe." He was followed by one who brought in a boy, and presented him in proper style with "Here's a health to thee, O Seuthes!" A third had "clothes for his wife." Timasion, the Dardanian, pledged Seuthes, and presented a silver bowl¹ and a carpet worth ten minae.²

¹ Or rather "saucer" (φιδλη).

² £40.

Gnesippus, an Athenian, got up and said: "It was a good old custom, and a fine one too, that those who had, should give to the king for honour's sake, but to those who had not, the king should give; whereby, my lord," he added, "I too may one day have the wherewithal to give thee gifts and honour." Xenophon the while was racking his brains what he was to do; he was not the happier because he was seated in the seat next Seuthes as a mark of honour; and Heracleides bade the cupbearer hand him the bowl. The wine had perhaps a little mounted to his head; he rose, and manfully seized the cup, and spoke: "I also, Seuthes, have to present you with myself and these my dear comrades to be your trusty friends, and not one of them against his will. They are more ready, one and all, still more than I, to be your friends. Here they are; they ask nothing from you in return, rather they are forward to labour in your behalf; it will be their pleasure to bear the brunt of battle in voluntary service. With them, God willing, you will gain vast territory; you will recover what was once your forefathers'; you will win for yourself new lands; and not lands only, but horses many, and of men a multitude, and many a fair dame besides. You will not need to seize upon them in robber fashion; it is your friends here who, of their own accord, shall take and bring them to you, they shall lay them at your feet as gifts." Up got Seuthes and drained with him the cup, and with him sprinkled the last drops fraternally.¹

At this stage entered musicians blowing upon horns such as they use for signal calls, and trumpeting on trumpets, made of raw oxhide, tunes and airs, like the music of the double-octave harp.² Seuthes himself got up and shouted, trolling forth a war song; then he sprang from his place and leapt about as though he would guard himself against a missile, in right nimble style. Then came in a set of clowns and jesters.

¹ For the Thracian custom, vide Suidas, s. v. κατασκεδάζειν.

² Or, "magadis." This is said to have been one of the most perfect instruments. It comprised two full octaves, the left hand playing the same notes as the right an octave lower. Guhl and Koner, p. 203, Engl. transl. See also Dict. Antiq. "Musica"; and Arist. Probl. xix. 18, Διὰ τὴν ἢ διὰ πασῶν συμφωνία ᾄδεται μόνη; μαγαδίζουσι γὰρ ταύτην, ἄλλην δὲ οὐδεμίαν, i.e. "since no interval except the octave (διὰ πασῶν) could be magadised (the effect of any other is well known to be intolerable), therefore no other interval was employed at all."

But when the sun began to set, the Hellenes rose from their seats. It was time, they said, to place the night sentinels and to pass the watchword; further, they begged of Seuthes to issue an order that none of the Thracians were to enter the Hellenic camp at night, "since between your Thracian foes and our Thracian friends there might be some confusion." As they sallied forth, Seuthes rose to accompany them, like the soberest of men. When they were outside,¹ he summoned the generals apart and said: "Sirs, our enemies are not aware as yet of our alliance. If, therefore, we attack them before they take precautions not to be caught, or are prepared to repel assault, we shall make a fine haul of captives and other stock." The generals fully approved of these views, and bade him lead on. He answered: "Prepare and wait; as soon as the right time comes I will be with you. I shall pick up the peltasts and yourselves, and with the help of the gods,² I will lead on." "But consider one point," urged Xenophon; "if we are to march by night, is not the Hellenic fashion best? When marching in the daytime that part of the army leads the van which seems best suited to the nature of the country to be traversed—heavy or light infantry, or cavalry; but by night our rule is that the slowest arm should take the lead. Thus we avoid the risk of being pulled to pieces: and it is not so easy for a man to give his neighbour the slip without intending, whereas the scattered fragments of an army are apt to fall foul of one another, and to cause damage or incur it in sheer ignorance." To this Seuthes replied: "You reason well, and I will adopt your custom. I will furnish you with guides chosen from the oldest experts of the country, and I will myself follow with the cavalry in the rear; it will not take me long, if need be, to present myself at the front." Then, for kinship's sake, they chose "Athenaia"³ as their watchword. With this, they turned and sought repose.

It was about midnight when Seuthes presented himself with his cavalry troopers armed with corselets, and his light in-

¹ Lit. "When he was come forth."

² Or, reading σὺν τοῖς ἱπποῖς With Hug after Hirschig, translate "and with the cavalry I will lead on."

³ "Our Lady of Athens."

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

Cleanor led the other Hellenes. When they had reached the villages, Seuthes, with about thirty troopers, rode up, exclaiming: "Well, Xenophon, this is just what you said! the fellows are caught, but now look here. My cavalry have gone off unsupported; they are scattered in pursuit, one here, one there, and upon my word, I am more than half afraid the enemy will collect somewhere and do them a mischief. Some of us must remain in the villages, for they are swarming with human beings." "Well then," said Xenophon, "I will seize the heights with the men I have with me, and do you bid Cleanor extend his line along the level beside the villages." When they had done so, there were enclosed—of captives for the slave market, one thousand; of cattle, two thousand; and of other small cattle, ten thousand. For the time being they took up quarters there.

iv.—But next day Seuthes burnt the villages to the ground; he left not a single house, being minded to inspire terror in the rest of his enemies, and to show them what they also were to expect, if they refused obedience; and so he went back again. As to the booty, he sent off Heracleides to Perinthus to dispose of it, with a view to future pay for the soldiers. But for himself he encamped with the Hellenes in the lowland country of the Thynians, the natives leaving the flats and betaking themselves in flight to the uplands.

There was deep snow, and cold so intense that the water brought in for dinner and the wine within the jars froze; and many of the Hellenes had their noses and ears frost-bitten. Now they came to understand why the Thracians wear fox-skin caps on their heads and about their ears; and why, on the same principle, they are frocked not only about the chest and bust but so as to cover the loins and thighs as well; and why on horseback they envelop themselves in long shawls which reach down to the feet, instead of the ordinary short rider's cloak. Seuthes sent off some of the prisoners to the hills with a message to say that if they did not come down to their homes, and live quietly and obey him, he would burn down their villages and their corn, and leave them to perish with hunger. Thereupon down they came, women and children and the older men; the younger men preferred to quarter themselves in the villages on the skirts of the hills. On discovering this, Seuthes bade Xenophon take the youngest of the heavy infantry and join him on an expedition. They rose in the night, and by daybreak had reached the villages; but the majority of the inhabitants made good their escape, for the hills were close at hand. Those whom he did catch, Seuthes unsparingly shot down.

VII. ii. 22. Herodotus uses it, ix. 66; so does Aristot. H. A. viii. 24, 4; so also Polybius, x. 20, 2; but the Atticists condemn it, Lobeck, Phryn. 582; except of course in poetry, e.g. Eur. Hel. 724.

Now there was a certain Olynthian, named Episthenes; he was a great lover of boys, and seeing a handsome lad, just in the bloom of youth and carrying a light shield, about to be slain, he ran up to Xenophon and supplicated him to rescue the fair youth. Xenophon went to Seuthes and begged him not to put the boy to death. He explained to him the disposition of Episthenes; how he had once enrolled a company, the only qualification required being that of personal beauty; and with these handsome young men at his side there was none so brave as he. Seuthes put the question, "Would you like to die in his behalf, Episthenes?" whereat the other stretched out his neck, and said, "Strike, if the boy bids you, and will thank his preserver." Seuthes, turning to the boy, asked, "Shall I smite him instead of you?" The boy shook his head, imploring him to slay neither the one nor the other, whereupon Episthenes caught the lad in his arms, exclaiming, "It is time you did battle with me, Seuthes, for my boy; never will I yield him up," and Seuthes laughed: 'what must be must,' and so consented.

In these villages he decided that they must bivouac, so that the men on the mountains might be still further deprived of subsistence. Stealthily descending he himself found quarters in the plain; while Xenophon with his picked troops¹ encamped in the highest village on the skirts of the hills; and the rest of the Hellenes hard by, among the highland Thracians,² as they are called.

After this, not many days had idly slipped away before the Thracians from the mountains came down and wished to arrange with Seuthes for terms of truce and hostages. Simultaneously came Xenophon and informed Seuthes that they were camped in bad quarters, with the enemy next door; "it would be pleasanter too," he added, "to bivouac in a strong position in the open, than under cover on the edge of destruction." The other bade him take heart and pointed to some of their hostages, as much as to say "Look there!" Parties also from the mountaineers came down and pleaded with Xenophon himself, to help arrange a truce for them. This he agreed to do, bidding them pluck up heart, and assuring them that they would meet with no mischief, if they yielded obedience to Seuthes. All their parleying, however, was, as it turned out, merely to get a closer inspection of things. This happened in the day, and in the following night the Thynians descended from the hill country and made an attack. In each case, the guide was the master of the house attacked; otherwise it would have taxed their powers to discover the houses in the dark, which, for the sake of their flocks and herds, were palisaded all round with great stockades. As soon as they had reached the doors of any particular house, the attack began, some hurling in their spears, others belabouring with their clubs, which they carried, it was said, for the purpose of knocking off the lance points from the shaft. Others were busy setting the place on fire; and they kept calling Xenophon by name: "Come out, Xenophon, and die like a man, or we will roast you alive inside."

¹ See above, p. 92, note 1.

² Cf. "Highlanders."

By this time too the flames were making their appearance through the roof, and Xenophon and his followers were within, with their coats of mail on, and big shields, swords, and helmets. Then Silanus, a Macistian,¹ a youth of some eighteen years, signalled on the trumpet; and in an instant, out they all leapt with their drawn swords, and the inmates of the other quarters as well. The Thracians took to their heels, according to their custom, swinging their light shields round their backs. As they leapt over the stockade some were captured, hanging on the top with their shields caught in the palings; others missed the way out, and so were slain; and the Hellenes chased them hotly, till they were outside the village.

¹ "Of Macistus," a town in the Triphylia near Scillus.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Byzantium, they reached the Delta, as it is called. Here they were no longer in the territory of Maesades, but in the country of Teres the Odrysian [an ancient worthy].¹ Here Heracleides met them with the proceeds of the spoil, and Seuthes picked out three pairs of mules (there were only three, the other teams being oxen); then he summoned Xenophon and bade him take them, and divide the rest between the generals and officers, to which Xenophon replied that for himself, he was content to receive his share another time, but added: "Make a present of these to my friends here, the generals who have served with me, and to the officers." So of the pairs of mules Timasion the Dardanian received one, Cleanor the Orchomenian one, and Phryniscus the Achaean one. The teams of oxen were divided among the officers. Then Seuthes proceeded to remit pay due for the month already passed, but all he could give was the equivalent of twenty days. Heracleides insisted that this was all he had got by his trafficking. Whereupon Xenophon with some warmth exclaimed: "Upon my word, Heracleides, I do not think you care for Seuthes' interest as you should. If you did, you would have been at pains to bring back the full amount of the pay, even if you had had to raise a loan to do so, and, if by no other means, by selling the coat off your own back."

What he said annoyed Heracleides, who was afraid of being ousted from the friendship of Seuthes, and from that day forward he did his best to calumniate Xenophon before Seuthes. The soldiers, on their side, laid the blame of course on Xenophon: "Where was their pay?" and Seuthes was vexed with him for persistently demanding it for them. Up to this date he had frequently referred to what he would do when he got to the seaboard again; how he intended to hand over to him Bisanthe, Ganos, and Neontichos.¹ But from this time forward he never mentioned one of them again. The slanderous tongue of Heracleides had whispered him:—it was not safe to hand over fortified towns to a man with a force at his back.

¹ See above, p. 207; the words "an ancient worthy" may possibly be an editor's or commentator's note.

² For Bisanthe see above, p. 208, note 4. Ganos, a little lower down the coast, with Neontichos once belonged to Alcibiades, if we may believe Cornelius Nepos, Alc. vii. 4. and Plutarch, Alc. c. 36. See above, p. 211, note 2.

Consequently Xenophon fell to considering what he ought to do as regards marching any further up the country ; and Heracleides introduced the other generals to Seuthes, urging them to say that they were quite as well able to lead the army as Xenophon, and promising them that within a day or two they should have full pay for two months, and he again implored them to continue the campaign with Seuthes. To which Timasion replied that for his part he would continue no campaign without Xenophon ; not even if they were to give him pay for five months ;" and what Timasion said, Phryniscus and Cleanor repeated ; the views of all three coincided.

Seuthes fell to upbraiding Heracleides in round terms. "Why had he not invited Xenophon with the others?" and presently they invited him, but by himself alone. He, perceiving the knavery of Heracleides, and that his object was to calumniate him with the other generals, presented himself ; but at the same time he took care to bring all the generals and the officers. After their joint consent had been secured, they continued the campaign. Keeping the Pontus on their right, they passed through the millet-eating¹ Thracians, as they are called, and reached Salmydessus. This is a point at which many trading vessels bound for the Black Sea run aground and are wrecked, owing to a sort of marshy ledge or sandbank which runs out for a considerable distance into the sea.² The Thracians, who dwell in these parts, have set up pillars as boundary marks, and each set of them has the pillage of its own flotsom and jetsom ; for in old days, before they set up these landmarks, the wreckers, it is said, used freely to fall foul of and slay one another. Here was a rich treasure

¹ Or, "the Melinophagi."

² See, for a description of this savage coast, Aesch. Prom. vinc. 726, etc. —

"τραχεῖα πόντου Σαλμυδησία γνάθος ἐχθρόξενος ναύταισι, μητρὶά νεῶν."

"The rugged Salmydesian jaw of the Black Sea, Inhospitable to sailors, stepmother of ships."

But the poet is at fault in his geography, since he connects "the Salmydesian jaw" with the Thermodon.

trove, of beds and boxes numberless, with a mass of written books, and all the various things which mariners carry in their wooden chests. Having reduced this district, they turned round and went back again. By this time the army of Seuthes had grown to be considerably larger than the Hellenic army; for on the one hand, the Odrysians flocked down in still larger numbers, and on the other, the tribes which gave in their adhesion from time to time were amalgamated with his armament. They got into quarters on the flat country above Selybria at about three miles¹ distance from the sea. As to pay, not a penny was as yet forthcoming, and the soldiers were cruelly disaffected to Xenophon, whilst Seuthes, on his side, was no longer so friendly disposed. If Xenophon ever wished to come face to face with him, want of leisure or some other difficulty always seemed to present itself.

VI.—At this date, when nearly two months had already passed, an embassy arrived. These were two agents from Thibron—Charminus, a Lacedaemonian, and Polynicus. They were sent to say that the Lacedaemonians had resolved to open a campaign against Tissaphernes, and that Thibron, who had set sail to conduct the war, was anxious to avail himself of the troops. He would guarantee that each soldier should receive a daric a month as pay, the officers double pay, and the generals quadruple. The Lacedaemonian emissaries had no sooner arrived than Heracleides, having learnt that they had come in search of the Hellenic troops, goes off himself to Seuthes and says: "The best thing that could have happened; the Lacedaemonians want these troops and you have done with them, so that if you hand over the troops to them, you will do the Lacedaemonians a good turn and will cease to be bothered for pay any more. The country will be quit of them once and for ever."

On hearing this Seuthes bade him introduce the emissaries. As soon as they had stated that the object of their coming was to treat for the Hellenic troops, he replied that he would willingly give them up, that his one desire was to be the friend and ally of Lacedaemon. So he invited them to par-

¹ Lit. "thirty stades." Selymbria is about forty-four miles from Byzantium, two-thirds of the way to Perinthus. See above, p. 207.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

as a penalty for all the long dance he has led us, I should feel I had got my pay in full, and no longer grudge the pains we have undergone." The speaker was followed by another and then another in the same strain ; and after that Xenophon made the following speech :—

"True is the old adage ; there is nothing which mortal man may not expect to see. Here am I being accused by you to-day, just where my conscience tells me that I have displayed the greatest zeal in your behalf. Was I not actually on my road home when I turned back ? Not, God knows, because I learned that you were in luck's way, but because I heard that you were in sore straits, and I wished to help you, if in any way I could. I returned, and Seuthes yonder sent me messenger after messenger, and made me promise upon promise, if only I could persuade you to come to him. Yet, as you yourselves will bear me witness, I was not to be diverted. Instead of setting to my hand to do that, I simply led you to a point from which, with least loss of time, I thought you could cross into Asia. This I believed was the best thing for you, and you I knew desired it.

"But when Aristarchus came with his ships of war and hindered our passage across, you will hardly quarrel with me for the step I then took in calling you together that we might advisedly consider our best course. Having heard both sides,—first Aristarchus, who ordered you to march to the Chersonese, then Seuthes, who pleaded with you to undertake a campaign with himself,—you all proposed to go with Seuthes ; and you all gave your votes to that effect. What wrong did I commit in bringing you, whither you were eager to go ? If, indeed, since the time when Seuthes began to tell lies and cheat us about the pay, I have supported him in this, you may justly find fault with me and hate me. But if I, who at first was most of all his friend, to-day am more than any one else at variance with him, how can I, who have chosen you and rejected Seuthes, in fairness be blamed by you for the very thing which has been the ground of quarrel between him and me ? But you will tell me, perhaps, that I get from Seuthes what is by right yours, and that I deal subtly by you ? But is it not clear that, if Seuthes has paid me any.

thing, he has at any rate not done so with the intention of losing by what he gives me, whilst he is still your debtor? If he gave to me, he gave in order that, by a small gift to me, he might escape a larger payment to yourselves. But if that is what you really think has happened, you can render this whole scheme of ours null and void in an instant by exacting from him the money which is your due. It is clear, Seuthes will demand back from me whatever I have got from him, and he will have all the more right to do so, if I have failed to secure for him what he bargained for when I took his gifts. But indeed I am far removed from enjoying what is yours, and I swear to you by all the gods and goddesses that I have not taken even what Seuthes promised me in private. He is present himself and listening, and he is aware in his own heart whether I swear falsely. And what will surprise you the more, I can swear besides, that I have not received even what the other generals have received, no, nor yet what some of the officers have received. But how so? why have I managed my affairs no better? I thought, sirs, the more I helped him to bear his poverty at the time, the more I should make him my friend in the day of his power. Whereas, it is just when I see the star of his good fortune rising, that I have come to divine the secret of his character.

“Some one may say, are you not ashamed to be so taken in like a fool? Yes, I should be ashamed, if it had been an open enemy who had so deceived me. But, to my mind, when friend cheats friend, a deeper stain attaches to the perpetrator than to the victim of deceit. Whatever precaution a man may take against his friend, that we took in full. We certainly gave him no pretext for refusing to pay us what he promised. We were perfectly upright in our dealings with him. We did not dawdle over his affairs, nor did we shrink from any work to which he challenged us.

“But you will say, I ought to have taken security of him at the time, so that had he fostered the wish, he might have lacked the ability to deceive. To meet that retort, I must beg you to listen to certain things, which I should never have said in his presence, except for your utter want of feeling towards me, or your extraordinary ingratitude. Try and recall the posture of your affairs, when I extricated you and brought you to Seuthes. Do you not recollect how at Perinthus Aristarchus shut the gates in your faces each time you offered to approach the town,¹ and how you were driven to camp outside under the canopy of heaven? It was midwinter; you were thrown upon the resources of a market wherein few were the articles offered for sale, and scanty the wherewithal to purchase them. Yet stay in Thrace you must, for there were ships of war riding at anchor in the bay, ready to hinder your passage across; and what did that stay imply? It meant being in a hostile country, confronted by countless cavalry, legions of light infantry. And what had we? A heavy infantry force certainly, with which we could have dashed at villages in a body possibly, and seized a modicum of food at most; but as to pursuing the enemy with such a force as ours, or capturing men or cattle, the thing was out of the question; for when I rejoined you your original cavalry and light infantry divisions had disappeared. In such sore straits you lay!

“Supposing that, without making any demands for pay whatever, I had merely won for you the alliance of Seuthes—whose cavalry and light infantry were just what you needed—would you not have thought that I had planned very well for you? I presume, it was through your partnership with him and his that you were able to find such complete stores of corn in the villages, when the Thracians were driven to take to their heels in such hot haste, and you had so large a share of captives and cattle. Why! from the day on which his cavalry force was attached to us, we never set eyes on a single foeman in the field, though up to that date the enemy with his cavalry and his light infantry used undauntedly to hang on our heels, and effectually prevented us from scattering in small bodies and reaping a rich harvest of provisions. But if he who partly gave you this security has failed to pay in full the wages due to you therefrom, is not that a terrible misfortune? So monstrous indeed that you think I ought not to go forth alive.²

¹ Reading εἰ προσῆτε τῇ πόλει, 'Aristarchus ὑμᾶς x.τ.λ.; or, if, with Hug and others, reading οὐκ εἰς μὲν Π. προσῆτε τῇ πόλει, 'Aristarchus δ' ὑμᾶς.—“Aristarchus shut the gates in your face, and you never entered the town.” For the incident referred to see above, p. 204.

² I.e. the fate of a scape-goat is too good for me.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

nay ; and you, on whom this large liberty dawns, who are sailing to a long desired goal, who are sought after by the greatest of military powers, who have pay in prospect, and for leaders these Lacedaemonians, our acknowledged chiefs : now is the appointed time, you think, to put me to a speedy death. But in the days of our difficulties it was very different, O ye men of marvellous memory ! No ! in those days you called me ‘ father ! ’ and you promised you would bear me ever in mind, ‘ your benefactor. ’ Not so, however, not so ungracious are those who have come to you to-day ; nor, if I mistake not, have you bettered yourselves in their eyes by your treatment of me.”

With these words he paused, and Charminus the Lacedaemonian got up and said : “ Nay, by the Twins, you are wrong, surely, in your anger against this man ; I myself can bear testimony in his favour. When Polynicus and I asked Seuthes, what sort of a man he was ? Seuthes answered :—he had but one fault to find with him, that he was too much the soldiers’ friend, which also was the cause why things went wrong with him, whether as regards us Lacedaemonians or himself, Seuthes.”

Upon that Eurylochus of Lusian, an Arcadian, got up and said (addressing the two Lacedaemonians), “ Yes, sirs ; and what strikes me is that you cannot begin your generalship of us better than by exacting from Seuthes our pay. Whether he like it or no, let him pay in full ; and do not take us away before.”

Polycrates the Athenian, who was put forward by Xenophon,¹ said : “ If my eyes do not deceive me, sirs, there stands Heracleides yonder, the man who received the property won by our toil, who took and sold it, and never gave back either to Seuthes or to us the proceeds of the sale, but kept the money to himself, like the thief he is. If we are wise, we will lay hold of him, for he is no Thracian, but a Hellene ; and against Hellenes is the wrong, he has committed.”

When Heracleides heard these words, he was in great consternation ; so he came to Seuthes and said : “ If we are wise we will get away from here out of reach of these fellows.” So they mounted their horses and were gone in a trice, galloping to their own camp. Subsequently Seuthes sent Abrozelmes, his private interpreter, to Xenophon, begging him to stay behind with one thousand heavy troops; and engaging duly to deliver to him the places on the seaboard, and the other things which he had promised; and then, as a great secret, he told him, that he had heard from Polynicus that if he once got into the clutches of the Lacedaemonians, Thibron was certain to put him to death. Similar messages kept coming to Xenophon by letter or otherwise from several quarters, warning him that he was calumniated, and had best be on his guard. Hearing which, he took two victims and sacrificed to Zeus the King: "Whether it were better and happier to stay with Seuthes on the terms proposed, or depart with the army?" The answer he received was, "Depart."

¹ Cf. Cyrop. I. vi. 19 ; and see above, p. 11, note 2.

VII.—After this, Seuthes removed his camp to some considerable distance; and the Hellenes took up their quarters in some villages, selecting those in which they could best supply their commissariat, on the road to the sea. Now these particular villages had been given by Seuthes to Medosades. Accordingly, when the latter saw his property in the villages being expended by the Hellenes, he was not over well pleased; and taking with him an Odrysian, a powerful person amongst those who had come down from the interior, and about thirty mounted troopers, he came and challenged Xenophon to come forth from the Hellenic host. He, taking some of the officers and others of a character to be relied upon, came forward. Then Medosades, addressing Xenophon, said: "You are doing wrong to pillage our villages; we give you fair warning—I, in behalf of Seuthes, and this man by my side, who comes from Medocus, the king up country—to be gone out of the land. If you refuse, understand, we have no notion of handing it over to you; but if you injure our country we will retaliate upon you as foes."

Xenophon, hearing what they had to say, replied: "Such language addressed to us by you, of all people, is hard to answer. Yet for the sake of the young man with you, I will attempt to do so, that at least he may learn how different your nature is from ours. We," he continued, "before we were your friends, had the free run of this country, moving this way or that, as it took our fancy, pillaging and burning just as we chose; and you yourself, Medosades, whenever you came to us on an embassy, camped with us, without apprehension of any foe. As a tribe collectively you scarcely approached the country at all, or if you found yourselves in it, you bivouacked with your horses bitted and bridled, as being in the territory of your superiors. Presently you made friends with us, and, thanks to us, by God's help you won this country, out of which to-day you seek to drive us; a country which we held by our own strength and gave to you. No hostile force, as you well know, was capable of expelling us. It might have been expected of you personally to speed us on our way with some gift, in return for the good we did you. Not so; even though our backs are turned to go, we are too slow in our movements for you. You will not suffer us to take up quarters even, if you can help it, and these words arouse no shame in you, either before the gods, or this Odrysian, in whose eyes to-day you are a man of means, though until you cultivated our friendship you lived a robber's life, as you have told us. However, why do you address yourself to me? I am no longer in command. Our generals are the Lacedaemonians, to whom you and yours delivered over the army for withdrawal; and that, without even inviting me to attend, you most marvellous of men, so that if I lost their favour¹ when I brought you the troops, I might now win their gratitude by restoring them."

As soon as the Odrysian had heard this statement, he exclaimed: "For my part, Medosades, I sink under the earth for very shame at what I hear. If I had known the truth before, I would never have accompanied you. As it is, I return at once. Never would King Medocus applaud me, if I drove forth his benefactors." With these words, he mounted his horse and rode away, and with him the rest of his horsemen, except four or five. But Medosades, still vexed by the pillaging of the country, urged Xenophon to summon the two Lacedaemonians; and he, taking the pick of his men, came to Charminus and Polynicus and informed them that they were summoned by Medosades; probably they, like himself, would be warned to leave the country; "if so," he ¹ Or lit. "so that just as I incurred their hatred when," etc.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

“Seuthes, I am here to advance no claims, but to show you, if I can, how unjust it was on your part to be angered with me because I zealously demanded of you on behalf of the soldiers what you promised them. According to my belief, it was no less to your interest to deliver it up, than it was to theirs to receive it. I cannot forget that, next to the gods, it was they who raised you up to a conspicuous eminence, when they made you king of large territory and many men, a position in which you cannot escape notice, whether you do good or do evil. For a man so circumstanced, I regarded it as a great thing that he should avoid the suspicion even of ungrateful parting with his benefactors. It was a great thing, I thought, that you should be well spoken of by six thousand human beings; but the greatest thing of all, that you should in no wise discredit the sincerity of your own word. For what of the man who cannot be trusted? I see that the words of his mouth are but vain words, powerless, and unhonoured; but with him who is seen to regard truth, the case is otherwise. He can achieve by his words what another achieves by force. If he seeks to bring the foolish to their senses—his very frown, I perceive, has a more sobering effect than the chastisement inflicted by another. Or in negotiations the very promises of such an one are of equal weight with the gifts of another.

“Try and recall to mind in your own case, what advance of money you made to us to purchase our alliance. You know you did not advance one penny. It was simply confidence in the sincerity of your word which incited all these men to assist you in your campaign, and so to acquire for you an empire, worth many times more than thirty talents,¹ which is all they now claim to receive. Here then, first of all, goes the credit which won for you your kingdom, sold for so mean a sum. Let me remind you of the great importance which you then attached to the acquisition of your present conquests. I am certain that to achieve what stands achieved to-day, you would willingly have foregone the gain of fifty times that paltry sum. To me it seems that to lose your present fortune were a more serious loss than never to have won it; since surely it is harder to be poor after being rich than never to have tasted wealth at all, and more painful to sink to the level of a subject, being a king, than never to have worn a crown.

¹ = £7312 : 10s.

“You cannot forget that your present vassals were not persuaded to become your subjects out of love for you, but by sheer force; and but for some restraining dread they would endeavour to be free again to-morrow. And how do you propose to stimulate their sense of awe, and keep them in good behaviour towards you? Shall they see our soldiers so disposed towards you that a word on your part would suffice to keep them now, or if necessary would bring them back again to-morrow? while others hearing from us a hundred stories in your praise, hasten to present themselves at your desire? Or will you drive them to conclude adversely, that through mistrust of what has happened now, no second set of soldiers will come to help you, for even these troops of ours are more their friends than yours? And indeed it was not because they fell short of us in numbers that they became your subjects, but from lack of proper leaders. There is a danger, therefore, now lest they should choose as their protectors some of us who regard ourselves as wronged by you, or even better men than us—the Lacedaemonians themselves; supposing our soldiers undertake to serve with more enthusiasm, if the debt you owe to them be first exacted; and the Lacedaemonians, who need their services, consent to this request. It is plain, at any rate, that the Thracians, now prostrate at your feet, would display far more enthusiasm in attacking, than in assisting you; for your mastery means their slavery, and your defeat their liberty.

“Again, the country is now yours, and from this time forward you have to make provision for what is yours; and how will you best secure it an immunity from ill? Either these soldiers receive their dues and go, leaving a legacy of peace behind, or they stay and occupy an enemy's country, whilst you endeavour, by aid of a still larger army, to open a new campaign and turn them out; and your new troops will also need provisions. Or again, which will be the greater drain on your purse? to pay off your present debt, or, with that still owing, to bid for more troops, and of a better quality?

“Heracleides, as he used to prove to me, finds the sum excessive. But surely it is a far less serious thing for you to take and pay it back to-day than it would have been to pay the tithe of it, before we came to you ; since the limit between less and more is no fixed number, but depends on the relative capacity of payer and recipient, and your yearly income now is larger than the whole property which you possessed in earlier days.

“ Well, Seuthes, for myself these remarks are the expression of friendly forethought for a friend. They are expressed in the double hope that you may show yourself worthy of the good things which the gods have given you, and that my reputation may not be ruined with the army. For I must assure you that to-day, if I wished to injure a foe, I could not do so with this army. Nor again, if I wished to come and help you, should I be competent to the task ; such is the disposition of the troops towards me. And yet I call you to witness, along with the gods who know, that never have I received anything from you on account of the soldiers. Never to this day have I, to my private gain, asked for what was theirs, nor even claimed the promises which were made to myself ; and I swear to you, not even had you proposed to pay me my dues, would I have accepted them, unless the soldiers also had been going to receive theirs too ; how could I ? How shameful it would have been in me, so to have secured my own interests, whilst I disregarded the disastrous state of theirs, I being so honoured by them. Of course to the mind of Heracleides this is all silly talk ; since the one great object is to keep money by whatever means. That is not my tenet, Seuthes.¹ I believe that no fairer or brighter jewel can be given to a man, and most of all a prince, than the threefold grace of valour, justice, and generosity. He that possesses these is rich in the multitude of friends which surround him ; rich also in the desire of others to be included in their number. While he prospers, he is surrounded by those who will rejoice with him in his joy ; or if misfortune overtake him, he has no lack of sympathisers to give him help. However, if you have failed to learn from my deeds that I was, heart and soul, your friend ; if my words are powerless to reveal the fact to-day, I would at least direct your attention to ¹ Or more lit. “ but for my part, Seuthes, I believe,” etc.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

“On these terms I may not accept them, only let us go free.”
 “Nay, but I know,” said Seuthes, “that it is safer for you to bide with me than to go away.” Then Xenophon again : “For your forethought I thank you, but I may not stay. Somewhere I may rise to honour, and that, be sure, shall redound to your gain also.”¹ Thereupon Seuthes spoke : “Of silver I have but little ; that little, however, I give to you, one talent ; but of beeves I can give you six hundred head, and of sheep four thousand, and of slaves six score. These take, and the hostages² besides, who wronged you, and begone.” Xenophon laughed and said : “But supposing these all together do not amount to the pay ; for whom is the talent, shall I say ? It is a little dangerous for myself, is it not ? I think I had better be on the look-out for stones when I return.”³ You heard the threats ?”

So for the moment he stayed there, but the next day Seuthes gave up to them what he had promised, and sent an escort to drive the cattle. The soldiers at first maintained that Xenophon had gone to take up his abode with Seuthes, and to receive what he had been promised ; so when they saw him they were pleased, and ran to meet him. And Xenophon, seeing Charminus and Polynicus, said : “Thanks to your intervention, thus much has been saved for the army. My duty is to deliver this fraction over to your keeping ; do you divide and distribute it to the soldiers.” Accordingly they took the property and appointed official vendors of the booty, and in the end incurred considerable blame. Xenophon held aloof. In fact it was no secret that he was making his preparations to return home, for as yet the vote of banishment had not been passed at Athens.⁴ But the authorities in the camp came to him and begged him not to go away until he had conducted the army to its destination, and handed it over to Thibron.

VIII.—From this place they sailed across to Lampsacus,

¹ Vide Hellenica, III. ii. 9.

² See above, p. 219.

³ See above, p. 223.

⁴ I.e. “at this moment the vote of banishment had not been passed which would prevent his return to Athens.” The natural inference from these words is, I think, that the vote of banishment was presently passed, at any rate considerably earlier than the battle of Coronæ in B.C. 394, five years and a half afterwards.

and here Xenophon was met by Eucleides the soothsayer, a Phliasian, the son of Cleagoras, who painted "the dreams"¹ in the Lyceum. Eucleides congratulated Xenophon upon his safe return, and asked him how much gold he had got? and Xenophon had to confess: "Upon my word, I shall have barely enough to get home, unless I sell my horse, and what I have about my person." The other could not credit the statement. Now when the Lampsacenes sent gifts of hospitality to Xenophon, and he was sacrificing to Apollo, he requested the presence of Eucleides; and the latter, seeing the victims, said: "Now I believe what you said about having no money. But I am certain," he continued, "if it were ever to come, there is an obstacle in the way. If nothing else, you are that obstacle yourself." Xenophon admitted the force of that remark. Then the other: "Zeus Meilichios² is an obstacle to you, I am sure," adding in another tone of voice, "have you tried sacrificing to that god, as I was wont to sacrifice and offer whole burnt offerings for you at home?" Xenophon replied that since he had been abroad, he had not sacrificed to that god. Accordingly Eucleides counselled him to sacrifice in the old customary way: he was sure that his fortune would improve. The next day Xenophon went on to Ophrynum and sacrificed, offering a holocaust of swine, after the custom of his family, and the signs which he obtained were favourable. That very day Bion and Nausicleides arrived laden with gifts for the army. These two were hospitably entertained by Xenophon, and were kind enough to repurchase the horse he had sold in Lampsacus for fifty darics;³ suspecting that he had parted with it out of need, and hearing that he was fond of the beast they restored it to him, refusing to be remunerated.

From this place they marched through the Troad, and, crossing Mount Ida, arrived at Antandrus, and then pushed along the seaboard of Mysia to the plain of Thebe.⁴ Thence they made

¹ Reading τὰ ἐνόντια, or if τὰ ἐνταλχία With Hug and others, translate "the wall-paintings" or the "frescoes." Others think that a writing, not a painting, is referred to.

² Zeus Meilichios, or the gentle one. See Thuc. i. 126. The festival of the Diasia at Athens was in honour of that god, or rather of Zeus under that aspect. Cf. Arist. Clouds, 408.

³ About "fifty guineas."

⁴ Thebe, a famous ancient town in Mysia, at the southern foot of Mt.

their way through Adramytium and Certonus¹ by Atarneus, coming into the plain of the Caïcus, and so reached Pergamus in Mysia.

Here Xénophon was hospitably entertained at the house of Hellas, the wife of Gongylus the Eretrian,² the mother of Gorgion and Gongylus. From her he learnt that Asidates, a Persian notable, was in the plain. "If you take thirty men and go by night, you will take him prisoner," she said, "wife, children, money, and all; of money he has a store;" and to show them the way to these treasures, she sent her own cousin and Daphnagoras, whom she set great store by. So then Xenophon, with these two to assist, did sacrifice; and Basias, an Eleian, the soothsayer in attendance, said that the victims were as promising as could be, and the great man would be an easy prey. Accordingly, after dinner he set off, taking with him the officers who had been his staunchest friends and confidants throughout; as he wished to do them a good turn. A number of others came thrusting themselves on their company, to the number of six hundred, but the officers repelled them: "They had no notion of sharing their portion of the spoil," they said, "just as though the property lay already at their feet."

About midnight they arrived. The slaves occupying the precincts of the tower, with the mass of goods and chattels, slipped through their fingers, their sole anxiety being to capture Asidates and his belongings. So they brought their batteries to bear, but failing to take the tower by assault (since it was high and solid, and well supplied with ramparts, besides having a large body of warlike defenders), they endeavoured to undermine it. The wall was eight clay bricks thick, but by daybreak the passage was effected and the wall undermined. At the first gleam of light through the aperture, Placius, which is often mentioned in Homer (Il. i. 366, vi. 397, xxii. 479, ii. 691). See Dict. Geog. s. v. The name Θήβης πεδῖον preserves the site. Cf. above Καὶστρου πεδῖον, and such modern names as "the Campagna" or "Piano di Sorrento," "Salisbury Plain" etc.

¹ The site of Certonus is not ascertained. Some critics have conjectured that the name should be Cytonium, a place between Mysia and Lydia; and Hug. who reads Κυτωνιον, omits ὁδεύσαντες παρ' Ἀταρνέα, "they made their way by Atarneus," as a gloss.

² Cf. Thuc. i. 128; also Hell. iii. i. 6.

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

The next day Xenophon sacrificed and led out the whole army under cover of night, intending to pierce far into the heart of Lydia with a view to lulling to sleep the enemy's alarm at his proximity, and so in fact to put him off his guard. But Asidates, hearing that Xenophon had again sacrificed with the intention of another attack, and was approaching with his whole army, left his tower and took up quarters in some villages lying under the town of Parthenium. Here Xenophon's party fell in with him, and took him prisoner, with his wife, his children, his horses, and all that he had ; and so the promise of the earlier victims was literally fulfilled. After that they returned again to Pergamus, and here Xenophon might well thank God with a warm heart, for the Laconians, the officers, the other generals, and the soldiers as a body united to give him the pick of horses and cattle teams, and the rest ; so that he was now in a position himself to do another a good turn.

Meanwhile Thibron arrived and received the troops, which he incorporated with the rest of his Hellenic forces,¹ and so proceeded to prosecute a war against Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus.²

¹ See Hell. III. i. 6.

² The MSS. add : " The following is a list of the governors of the several territories of the king which were traversed by us during the expedition : Artimas, governor of Lydia ; Artacamas, of Phrygia ; Mithridates, of Lycaonia and Cappadocia ; Syennesis, of Cilicia ; Dernes, of Phoenicia and Arabia ; Belesys, of Syria and Assyria ; Rhoparas, of Babylon ; Arbacas, of Media ; Tiribazus, of the Phasians and Hesperites. Then some independent tribes—the Carduchians or Kurds, and Chalybes, and Chaldaeans, and Macrones, and Colchians, and Mossynoecians, and Coetians, and Tibarenians. Then Corylas, the governor of Paphlagonia ; Pharnabazus, of the Bithynians ; Seuthes, of the European Thracians. The entire journey, ascent and descent, consisted of two hundred and fifteen stages = one thousand one hundred and fifty-five parasangs = thirty-four thousand six hundred and fifty stades. Computed in time, the length of ascent and descent together amounted to one year and three months." The annotator apparently computes the distance from Ephesus to Cotyora. See above, Anab. II. ii. 6, p. 44. note 1, compared with Anab. V. v. 4, p. 147, note 1.

Charmado' Nla

Curian
Se BABYLON

R A B I A

1000

1000

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

- them off, ib. 7 foll., p. 197; adds further threats, ib. 11, p. 197; orders them off to the Chersonese, ib. 13, p. 197; flees in terror to the citadel, ib. 20, p. 199; takes further steps to be rid of them, ib. 34 foll., p. 201; admits Xenophon on certain terms, ib. 39, p. 202; leaves Byzantium, VII. ii. 5, p. 203; deceived in Pharnabazus, sends Xenophon back to the army, ib. 8, p. 203; Aristarchus's opposition to, ib. 13, p. 204
- Antandrus, Anab. VII. viii. 7, p. 237
- Antileon, of Thurii, Anab. V. i. 3, p. 132
- Apollo, and Marsyas, Anab. I. ii. 8, p. 5; Xenophon's dedicatory offering to, V. iii. 4, p. 140; Xenophon sacrifices at Lampsacus to, VII. viii. 3, p. 237
- Apollonia, a town of Mysia, Anab. VII. viii. 15, p. 239
- Apollonides, a faint-hearted officer, degraded, Anab. III. i. 26.32, p. 71 foll.
- Arabia, Anab. I. v. 1, p. 17; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Araxes, the river, Anab. I. iv. 19, p. 17
- Arbaces, one of the four generals of Artaxerxes, Anab. I. vii. 12, p. 25; governor of Media, VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Arcadians and Achaeans form numerically the larger half of the army, Anab. VI. ii. 10 foll., p. 175 foll.; separate at Heraclea, with the Achaeans, from the rest of the army, VI. ii. 12, p. 175; set sail first and disembark at Calpe Haven, VI. iii. 1 foll., p. 176; get into great danger and are rescued by Xenophon's division, VI. iii. 17 foll., p. 179 foll.; their dance, VI. i. 11, p. 168; an Arcadian blames Xenophon before the Laconian envoy, VII. vi. 8, p. 223
- Archagoras, an Argive exile, an officer, Anab. IV. ii. 13-17, p. 103
- Arexion, an Arcadian soothsayer, Anab. VI. iv. 13, p. 182; VI. v. 2, p. 185; VI. v. 8, p. 186
- Argo, the ship, Anab. VI. iii. 1, p. 173
- Ariacus, the friend of Cyrus, commands his left wing in the battle, Anab. I. viii. 5, p. 27; perceiving fall of Cyrus, betakes himself to flight, I. ix. 31, p. 35; the generals offer to place him on the king's throne, II. i. 4, p. 40; declines, II. ii. 1, p. 43; exchange of oaths between, and the Hellenes, II. ii. 8 foll., p. 44; his proposed route home, II. ii. 11, p. 44; receives overtures from the king, and pays less attention to the Hellenes, II. iv. 1 foll., p. 50 foll.; suspicious behaviour on the part of, II. iv. 9 foll., p. 52; at the Tigris, ib. 15 foll., p. 53; brings a message from the king after the arrest of the generals, II. v. 35, p. 60; is answered by Cleonor and Xenophon, ib. 39 foll., p. 60 foll.
- Aristarchus succeeds Cleander as Laconian governor at Byzantium; sells no less than four hundred of the Cyreian troops, Anab. VII. ii. 5 foll., p. 203; instigated by Pharnabazus, prevents the army crossing over from Perinthus into Asia, VII. ii. 12, p. 204; VII. vi. 13, p. 224; VII. vi. 24, p. 226; plots against Xenophon, VII. ii. 14, p. 204; is foiled, VII. iii. 2 foll., p. 208 foll.
- Aristeas, of Chios, a captain of light infantry, Anab. IV. i. 28, p. 101; IV. vi. 20, p. 121
- Aristippus, the Thessalian, receives money and troops from Cyrus, Anab. I. i. 10, p. 3; friendship with Menon, II. vi. 28, p. 65
- Ariston, an Athenian, Anab. V. vi. 14, p. 152
- Aristonymus, of Methydrium, a heavy infantry officer, Anab. IV. i. 27, p. 100; IV. vi. 20, p. 121; his bravery, IV. vii. 9, p. 123
- Armenia, Anab. III. v. 17, p. 96; sources of Tigris and Euphrates in, IV. i. 3, p. 97; the Centrites, the

- frontier river between, and the country of the Carduchians, IV. iii. 1, p. 105; the hills of, IV. iii. 20, p. 108
- Armenia, Western, Anab. IV. iv. 4, p. 110; boys play the part of waiters, IV. v. 33, p. 118; the horses of, IV. v. 36 foll., p. 118 foll.
- Artacamas, governor of Phrygia, Anab. VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Artagereses, general in command of Artaxerxes' cavalry, Anab. I. vii. 11, p. 25; slain by Cyrus with his own hand, I. viii. 24, p. 30
- Artaozus, like Ariaeus, had been a trusty friend to Cyrus, Anab. II. iv. 16, p. 53; his conduct after the murder of the generals, II. v. 35, p. 60
- Artapates, the trustiest of Cyrus's wand-bearers, Anab. I. vi. 11, p. 23; slain upon the body of Cyrus, I. viii. 28, p. 31
- Artaxerxes, elder brother to Cyrus; Anab. I. i. 1, p. 1; succeeds his father Darius, I. i. 3, p. 1; wounded by Cyrus, attended by Ctesias, I. viii. 26, p. 30; plunders the camp of Cyrus, I. x. 1, p. 35; bids the Hellenes surrender their arms, II. i. 18, p. 40; is taken aback by the approach of the army, II. iii. 1, p. 46; oaths and pledges exchanged between him and the Hellenes, II. iii. 25, p. 50; his natural brother leads an army to assist him, II. iv. 25, p. 54
- Artemis of the Ephesians, temple of, Anab. I. vi. 7, p. 22; yearly sacrifice at Athens to, III. ii. 12, p. 77; a tithe of the spoils selected for Apollo and, divided between the generals at Cerasus, V. iii. 4, p. 140; what Xenophon did with the gift for, V. iii. 9, p. 141
- Artimas, governor of Lydia, Anab. VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Artuchas, mercenaries of, Anab. IV. iii. 4, p. 105
- Arystas, an Arcadian, a huge eater, Anab. VII. iii. 23, p. 212
- Asidates, a Persian notable, Anab. VII. viii. 9, p. 238; VII. viii. 15, p. 239; capture of, by Xenophon, VII. viii. 22, p. 240
- Aspendians, Anab. I. ii. 12, p. 6
- Assyria, Anab. VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Assyrian heavy infantry from Comania, Anab. VII. viii. 15, p. 239
- Atarneus, a city in the Aeolid, Anab. VII. viii. 8, p. 238
- Athenaia, Anab. VII. iii. 39, p. 214
- Athenians, the, valour of, in Persian Wars, Anab. III. ii. 11, p. 77; 'are clever at stealing public moneys,' IV. vi. 16, p. 120; power of, at beginning of Peloponnesian war, VII. i. 27 foll., p. 199 foll.; relationship of, to Thracians, VII. ii. 31, p. 207 and note; treasury of, at Delphi, V. iii. 5, p. 140
- Babylon, Anab. II. ii. 6, p. 44 note; V. v. 4, p. 147 note
- Babylonia, Anab. I. vii. 1, p. 23; II. ii. 13, p. 45
- Basias, an Arcadian, Anab. IV. i. 18, p. 99
- Basias, an Eleian, a soothsayer, Anab. VII. viii. 10, p. 238
- Belesys, ruler of Syria, Anab. I. iv. 10, p. 5; governor of Syria and Assyria, VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Bion, a Laconian envoy, buys back Xenophon's horse for him, Anab. VII. viii. 6, p. 237
- Bisanthe, a fortress on the Propontis, Anab. VII. ii. 38, p. 208; VII. v. 8, p. 220
- Bithynians, the, Anab. VI. ii. 17, p. 176
- Bithynian Thracians, the, Anab. VI. iv. 2, p. 180; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Boeotia, Anab. V. iii. 6, p. 140
- Boiscus, the boxer, a Thessalian, Anab. V. viii. 23, p. 166
- Byzantines, the, in panic, Anab. VII. i. 19, p. 198; at sixes and sevens, ib. 39, p. 202
- Byzantium, Cleander the Spartan, governor at, Anab. VI. ii. 13, p. 175; Anaxibius, Spartan admiral, being

- in, agrees with Pharnabazus to convey the Hellenic army out of Asia, VII. i. 1, p. 196; the Hellenes cross to, ib. 7, p. 197; in danger of being sacked, ib. 15, p. 198; before the war, belonged to Athens, ib. 27, p. 200; Xenophon asks to enter, ib. 38, p. 201; Aristarchus succeeds Cleander as governor of, VII. ii. 5, p. 203; four hundred of the Cyreians sold by Aristarchus in, ib. 6, p. 203
- Caenae, city on the Tigris, Anab. III. iv. 28, p. 55
- Caicus, the plain of the, Anab. VII. viii. 8, p. 238
- Callimachus, an Arcadian, captain of the heavy armed, Anab. IV. i. 27, p. 100; IV. vii. 8, p. 123; his bravery, IV. vii. 10, p. 123; sent as ambassador to Sinope, V. vi. 14, p. 152; to Heraclea, VI. ii. 7, p. 174 foll.; a ringleader in detaching the Arcadians and Achaeans from the army, VI. ii. 9 foll., p. 174
- Calpe Haven, Anab. VI. ii. 13, p. 175; VI. ii. 17, p. 176; VI. iii. 1, p. 176; VI. iv. 1, p. 180
- Cappadocia, Anab. I. ii. 20, p. 7; I. ix. 7, p. 32; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Carcasus, the river, Anab. VII. viii. 18, p. 239
- Carduchians, the, or Kurds, a people dwelling on the hills addicted to war and not subject to the king, Anab. III. v. 16 foll., p. 95 foll.; V. v. 17, p. 148; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 foll.; Hellenes resolve to force a passage into territory of, III. v. 17, p. 96; IV. i. 2, p. 97 foll.; will not be friendly, IV. i. 8 foll., p. 98; harassing attacks of, IV. i. 16 foll., p. 99 foll.; occupy a pass, IV. i. 19 foll., p. 100; are with difficulty dislodged, IV. ii. 1 foll., p. 101; dwellings of, had their wine in cemented cisterns, IV. i. 22, p. 104; methods of fighting, excellent archers, IV. ii. 24 foll., p. 104 foll.; the seven days spent in traversing the country of, a continuous battle, IV. iii. 2, p. 105; threaten the rear of the enemy at the passage of the Centrites, IV. iii. 7 foll., p. 106 foll.
- Carsus, a river of Cilicia, Anab. I. iv. 4, p. 14
- Castolus, plain of the, Anab. I. i. 2, p. 1; I. ix. 7, p. 32
- Caystru-pedion, Anab. I. ii. 11, p. 6
- Celaenae, city of Phrygia, Anab. I. ii. 7 foll., p. 5
- Centrites, frontier river between Armenia and Carduchia, Anab. IV. iii. 1, p. 105; IV. iii. 15, p. 107
- Cephisodorus, an Athenian, Anab. IV. ii. 13, p. 103; is killed, IV. ii. 17, p. 103
- Ceramôn-agora, a populous city on the confines of Mysia, Anab. I. ii. 10, p. 6
- Cerasus, a Hellenic city on the sea, colony of Sinope in Colchis, Anab. V. iii. 2, p. 139; V. v. 10, p. 148; V. viii. 13 foll., p. 159 foll.
- Cerberus, the dog, Anab. VI. ii. 2, p. 173
- Certonus, perhaps this should be Cytonium, Anab. VII. viii. 8, p. 238 and note 1
- Chalcedon, or Calchedon, Anab. VII. i. 20, p. 199; VII. ii. 24-26, p. 206
- Chalcedonia, or more properly Calchedonia, Anab. VI. vi. 38, p. 195
- Chaldaean mercenaries, Anab. IV. iii. 4, p. 105; V. v. 17, p. 148; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Chalus, the river, Anab. I. iv. 9, p. 15
- Chalybes, the Armenian, Anab. IV. v. 34, p. 118; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note; mercenaries of Tiribarus, IV. iv. 18, p. 112; encounter Hellenes, IV. vi. 5, p. 119; their bravery and dress, IV. vii. 15, p. 124; a different tribe, subject to the Mossynocians, V. v. 1, p. 146
- Charmande, city on the Euphrates, Anab. I. v. 10, p. 19
- Charminus, a Lacedaemonian, an agent of Thibron, Anab. VII. vi. 1, p. 222; VII. vi. 39, p. 228
- Cheirisophus, the Lacedaemonian, joins Cyrus with seven hundred

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

- Thebes, Anab. VII. i. 33 foll., p. 201 foll.
- Coetians, Anab. VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Colchians, the, Anab. IV. viii. 9, p. 127; IV. viii. 22, p. 130; V. vii. 2, p. 157; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Colchis, Anab. IV. viii. 23, p. 130; V. iii. 2, p. 139
- Colossae, a city of Phrygia, Anab. I. ii. 6, p. 4
- Comania, Assyrian heavy infantry from, Anab. VII. viii. 15, p. 239
- Corylas, the chief of Paphlagonia, Anab. V. v. 12-22, pp. 148, 149; V. vi. 11, p. 152; VI. i. 2, p. 167; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Cotyora, a Hellenic city, colony of Sinope, in the territory of the Tiberenians, Anab. V. v. 3 foll., p. 147 foll.
- Cretans, archers, Anab. I. ii. 9, p. 5; their range in shooting, III. iii. 7, p. 83; ib. 15, p. 84; of great service, IV. ii. 28, p. 105; IV. iii. 29, p. 109; at Trapezus compete for the long race, IV. viii. 27, p. 130
- Ctesias, the surgeon, heals Artaxerxes' wound, Anab. I. viii. 26, p. 30 and note; his testimony quoted, ib. 27, p. 30 foll.
- Cydnus, a river flowing through the city of Tarsus in Cilicia, Anab. I. ii. 23, p. 8
- Cyniscus, Anab. VII. i. 13, p. 198
- Cyreian camp, during the battle plundered by the king, Anab. I. x. 1, p. 35; the Cyreian army, i.e. Cyrus's Hellenic force, Pharnabazus transacts with Aristarchus concerning, VII. ii. 7, p. 203
- Cyrus (the younger), accompanied by a body of Hellenes, Anab. I. i. 2, p. 1; imprisoned by Artaxerxes on the accusation of Tissaphernes, ib. 3, p. 1; liberated at the intercession of his mother Parysatis, returns to his province and secretly collects forces to dethrone and attack Artaxerxes, ib. 6 foll., p. 2 foll.; begins his march from Sardis, I. ii. 5, p. 4; and Epyaxa, ib. 12, p. 6; and Clearchus, I. iii. 1 foll., p. 9 foll.; joined by his fleet, I. iv. 28, p. 13; Xenias and Pasion desert, at Myriandus, ib. 8, p. 14; at Thapsacus announces his designs, ib. 11, p. 16; miraculous passage of Euphrates by, ib. 17, p. 17; intervenes between Menon and Clearchus, I. v. 15 foll., p. 20; and Orontas, I. vi. 1 foll., p. 21 foll.; preparations for battle, I. vii. 1 foll., p. 23; and Gaulites, ib. 5, p. 24; and Silanus, ib. 18, p. 26; goes into battle unhelmeted, I. viii. 6, p. 27; and Xenophon, ib. 15, p. 28; slays Artagerses, ib. 24, p. 30; wounds Artaxerxes, ib. 26, p. 30; is slain, ib. 27, p. 31; his body mutilated, I. x. 1, p. 35; his character, I. ix. 1 foll., p. 31 foll.
- Cyrus, the elder, Anab. I. ix. 1, p. 31
- Cytonium, see Certonus, Anab. VII. viii. 8, p. 238 note
- Cyzicus, Anaxibius and Aristarchus at, Anab. VII. ii. 5, p. 203
- Damaratus, the Laconian, a descendant of Procles, Anab. II. i. 3, p. 39; VII. viii. 17, p. 239
- Dana, or Tyana, a city of Cappadocia, Anab. I. ii. 20, p. 7
- Daphnagoras, Anab. VII. viii. 9, p. 238
- Dardas, the river, Anab. I. iv. 10, p. 15
- Darius, Anab. I. i. 1, p. 2
- Delphi, Xenophon consults Apollo at, Anab. III. i. 5, p. 68; Athenian treasury at, V. iii. 5, p. 140; Zeus, the King, named in the oracle given to Xenophon at, VI. i. 2, p. 170
- Delta of Thrace, Anab. VII. i. 33, p. 201 and note; VII. v. 1, p. 220
- Democrates, a Temenite, Anab. IV. iv. 15, p. 112 and note
- Dercylidas, the Laconian, Anab. V. vi. 24, p. 155
- Dernes, governor of Phoenicia and Arabia, Anab. VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Dexippus, a Laconian, his treacherous departure from Trapezus, meddling

- in Thrace, and subsequent death, Anab. V. i. 15, p. 134; how he traduced Xenophon to Anaxibius, VI. i. 32, p. 172; and the soldiers at Calpe, VI. vi. 5 foll., p. 190; and Agasias, VI. vi. 22, p. 193
- Dolopes, the, a Thessalian tribe, Anab. I. ii. 6, p. 5
- Dracontius, a Spartan, presides over the games at Trapezus, Anab. IV. viii. 25, p. 130; sent by Xenophon with deputation to Cleander, VI. vi. 30, p. 194
- Drilae, the, a hill tribe, near Trapezus, Anab. V. ii. 1, p. 135
- Ecbatana, capital of Media, Anab. II. iv. 25, p. 54; III. v. 15, p. 95
- Enyalius, the god of battle, Anab. I. viii. 18, p. 29; V. ii. 14, p. 137
- Ephesus, Anab. I. iv. 2, p. 13; II. ii. 6, p. 44 note; the temple and statue at, V. iii. 8 foll., p. 141; an incident which befell Xenophon when setting out from, VI. i. 23, p. 171
- Episthenes, of Amphipolis, in command of the peltasts, Anab. I. x. 7, p. 36; the Armenian headman's son entrusted to him, IV. vi. 1, p. 118; takes the boy home with him, IV. vi. 3, p. 119
- Episthenes, of Olynthus, Anab. VII. iv. 7, p. 217
- Epyaxa, wife of Syennesis, king of the Cilicians, Anab. I. ii. 12, p. 6
- Eteonicus, a Lacedaemonian, at Byzantium, Anab. VII. i. 12, p. 197; VII. i. 20, p. 199
- Eucleides, the soothsayer, a Phliasian, meets Xenophon, Anab. VII. viii. 1, p. 237
- Euphrates, the river, Anab. I. iv. 11, p. 15; ib. 15, p. 16; ib. 17, p. 17; IV. v. 2, p. 113
- Eurylochus of Lusia, an Arcadian hoplite protects Xenophon with his shield, Anab. IV. ii. 21, p. 104; his valour in storming a Taochian fortress, IV. vii. 11 foll., p. 123; sent to Anaxibius, VII. i. 32, p. 200; agrees with Xenophon in demanding pay from Seuthes, VII. vi. 40, p. 228
- Eurymachus, a Dardanian, Anab. V. vi. 21, p. 154
- Ganos, a Thracian fortress, Anab. VII. v. 8, p. 220 and note
- Gates, the, of Babylonia, Anab. I. v. 5, p. 18
- Gates, the, of Cilicia and Syria, Anab. I. iv. 4, p. 14
- Caulites, a Samian exile, a friend of Cyrus, Anab. I. vii. 5, p. 24
- Glus, one of Cyrus's officers, Anab. I. iv. 16, p. 17; I. v. 7, p. 18; son of Tamos, II. i. 3, p. 39; announces the death of Cyrus, II. iv. 24, p. 54
- Gnesippus, an Athenian, his after-dinner speech, Anab. VII. iii. 28, p. 213
- Gobryas, one of Artaxerxes' generals, Anab. I. vii. 12, p. 25
- Gongylus, Eretrians, father and son, Anab. VII. viii. 8, p. 238; the son's part in the capture of Asidates, ib. 17, p. 239
- Gorgias, of Leontini, Anab. II. vi. 16, p. 163 and note 2
- Gorgion, son of Hellas and Gongylus, Anab. VII. viii. 8, p. 238
- Gymnias, a city, perhaps at no great distance from Baibut, Anab. IV. vii. 19, p. 125 and note 1
- Halisarna, Anab. VII. viii. 17, p. 239
- Halys, the river, Anab. V. vi. 9, p. 153; VI. ii. 1, p. 173
- Harmene, a port near Sinope, Anab. VI. i. 15, p. 169 foll., and note 3
- Harpasus, the river, Anab. IV. vii. 18, p. 124
- Hecatonymus, ambassador from Sinope, Anab. V. v. 7, p. 147; ib. 20, p. 149; V. vi. 3, p. 150
- Hegesander, an Arcadian, Anab. VI. iii. 5, p. 177
- Helios, Anab. IV. v. 35, p. 118. See Sun
- Hellas, Anab. I. ii. 8, p. 5; II. iv. 13, p. 52; V. vi. 15, p. 153; ib. 22, p. 154; ib. 33, p. 156; V. vii. 6, p. 157; ib. 7, p. 158

Hellas, the Wife of Gongylus, Anab. VII. viii. 8, p. 238

Hellenes, numbers of, with Cyrus, Anab. I. ii. 9 foll., p. 5 foll.; I. vii. 10, p. 25; their reluctance to go against Artaxerxes, I. iii. 1, p. 9; I. iv. 12, p. 16; position of, and achievements in the battle, I. viii. 2 foll., p. 27 foll.; gallantry of, left to guard the camp, I. x. 3 foll., p. 35 foll.; second victory of the, ib. 4 foll., p. 36 foll.; return to camp, ib. 17, p. 38; learn that Cyrus is dead, II. i. 4 foll., p. 40 foll.; receive a summons from the king, ib. 7 foll., p. 40 foll.; rejoin Ariaeus, II. ii. 8, p. 44; panic in the camp of, ib. 19, p. 46; receive new proposals from the king, II. iii. 1 foll., p. 46 foll.; and Tissaphernes, ib. 17 foll., p. 49 foll.; suspicions of the, against Ariaeus, II. iv. 1 foll., p. 50 foll.; march and encamp apart from Tissaphernes and Ariaeus, ib. 8 foll., p. 52; reach and cross Tigris, ib. 13 foll., p. 52 foll.; at the Zapatas their generals are treacherously slain by Tissaphernes; indignant interview of the, with Ariaeus, II. v. 32 foll., p. 59 foll.; in deep perplexity, III. i. 1, p. 67; choose new generals, ib. 47, p. 74; hold a general meeting, and adopt Xenophon's resolutions, III. ii. 1 foll., p. 74 foll.; cross the Zapatas, III. iii. 6, p. 83; sufferings of their rear-guard, ib. 7, p. 83; enrol slingers and cavalry, ib. 20, p. 85; after an encounter with Mithridates reach Larissa on the Tigris, III. iv. 3 foll., p. 86; skirmish successfully with Tissaphernes, ib. 15 foll., p. 87 foll.; discover and remedy defect of marching in a square with enemy behind, ib. 19 foll., p. 88 foll.; their difficulties in hilly ground, ib. 25 foll., p. 89 foll.; appoint eight surgeons, ib. 30, p. 90; outmarch the Persians, ib. 34, p. 91; dislodge the enemy from a mountain spur, ib. 44 foll., p. 92 foll.; despondency of the, in the plain of the Tigris, and at burning of villages by enemy, III. v. 1 foll., p. 93 foll.; retrace steps towards Babylon to unburnt villages, ib. 13, p. 95; cross a pass and descend into Carduchia, IV. i. 7, p. 98; hard fighting of the, in Carduchia during seven days, ib. 11, p. 99 foll.; use Carduchian arrows as javelins, IV. ii. 28, p. 105; recruit themselves in villages above the Centrites, IV. iii. 1, p. 105; difficulty in crossing the Centrites, and despondency of the, ib. 5, p. 105 foll.; effect the passage, ib. 31 foll., p. 110; march through plain of Western Armenia to the Teleboas, meet and make a treaty with Tiribazus the governor, IV. iv. 1 foll., p. 110 foll.; their sufferings from snow and cold, ib. 11 foll., p. 111 foll.; out-manceuvre Tiribazus and capture his camp, ib. 15 foll., p. 112 foll.; ford Euphrates; march through snow; sacrifice to Boreas, IV. v. 1 foll., p. 113 foll.; extreme misery of the, from cold and hunger, ib. 5 foll., p. 114 foll.; rest in good village quarters, ib. 22 foll., p. 116 foll.; after a week's rest march onwards; their guide runs away, IV. vi. 1 foll., p. 118 foll.; cross Phasis (Παρίη-Σα); encounter Chalybes, Taochians, Phasians on a pass, ib. 5 foll., p. 119; force the pass by a flank march, ib. 22 foll., p. 121 foll.; storm a Taochian fortress, IV. vii. 1 foll., p. 122 foll.; march through the Chalybes; reach the Harpasus; march through the Scythenians, ib. 15 foll., p. 124; reach Gymnias; catch sight of the sea from Mount Theches; their delight, IV. vii. 9 foll., p. 125 foll.; dismiss the guide, ib. 27, p. 126; march through country of the Macrones, with whom they exchange pledges, IV. viii. 1 foll., p. 126 foll.; encounter the Colchians; storm their position by columns of sections, ib. 9 foll., p. 127 foll.; suffer from poisonous honey, ib. 19 foll., p. 129; reach Trapezus; pay

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

- Medosades, touching certain villages, VII. vii. 1 foll., p. 229 foll.; cross to Lampsacus, VII. viii. 1, p. 236; march through the Troad to Pergamus, ib. 8, p. 237 foll.; incorporated with the rest of Thibron's Hellenic forces, ib. 26, p. 240
- Heraclea Pontica, Anab. V. vi. 10, p. 152; Hellenic city, colony of the Megarians, VI. ii. 1, p. 173; distance of, from Byzantium, VI. iv. 2, p. 180; and often
- Heracleides, of Maronea, Anab. VII. iii. 16, p. 211; sent by Seuthes to Perinthus to dispose of booty, VII. iv. 2, p. 216; returns with proceeds of spoil, VII. v. 5, p. 220; calumniates Xenophon, etc., ib. 6 foll., p. 220 foll.; a Hellene, VII. vi. 41, p. 228; Xenophon's criticism of, VII. vii. 35 foll., p. 233 foll.
- Heracleots, the, traders, Anab. V. vi. 19, p. 153; the Arcadians get vessels from the, VI. ii. 19, p. 176
- Heracles, the thank-offerings to, Anab. IV. viii. 24, p. 130 and note 3; Xenophon consults, VI. ii. 15, p. 175; "Zeus the Saviour, Heracles our Guide," used as watchword, VI. v. 25, p. 188; where he descended to bring up Cerberus, VI. ii. 2, p. 173
- Hesperites, the, Anab. VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note 2
- Hieronymus, the Eleian, eldest of Proxenus's captains, Anab. III. i. 34, p. 72; VI. iv. 10, p. 182; sent to Anaxibius as the bearer of a resolution, VII. i. 32, p. 200
- Hieronymus, an Euodean, Anab. VII. iv. 18, p. 219 and note 1
- Hyrcanian cavalry, Anab. VII. viii. 15, p. 239 note
- Iconium, city of Phrygia, Anab. I. ii. 19, p. 7
- Ida, Mount, Anab. VII. viii. 7, p. 237
- Ionia, Anab. I. i. 6, p. 2; I. ii. 21, p. 8; I. iv. 13, p. 16; II. i. 3, p. 39; II. ii. 6, p. 44 note 1; III. v. 15, p. 95
- Iris, river, Anab. V. vi. 9, p. 151; VI. ii. 1, p. 173
- Issi, city of Cilicia, Anab. I. ii. 24, p. 8; I. iv. 1, p. 13
- Itabelius, relieves Asidates, Anab. VII. viii. 15, p. 239
- Jason's beach, Anab. VI. ii. 1, p. 173
- Lacedaemon, Anab. V. iii. 11, p. 141
- Lacedaemonians, the, and Thracians, Anab. II. vi. 2, p. 61; "the peers of," taught stealing as boys, IV. vi. 15, p. 120; persistent effort of, to win the "leadership" throughout the war, VI. i. 27, p. 171; "are the lords of Hellas," VI. vi. 12, p. 191; the power of the, ubiquitous, VII. i. 28, p. 200
- Laconian dagger, Anab. IV. vii. 16, p. 124
- Lampsacus, Anab. VII. viii. 1, p. 236; ib. 6, p. 237
- Larissa, on the Tigris, Anab. III. iv. 7, p. 86 and note 2
- Lotus-eaters, the, Anab. III. ii. 25, p. 79 note 3
- Lycaea, the, an Arcadian festival, Anab. I. ii. 10, p. 6 and note 1
- Lycaonia, Anab. I. ii. 19, p. 7; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note 1
- Lycaonians, Anab. III. ii. 23, p. 79 and note 1
- Lyceum, the gymnasium at Athens, Anab. VII. viii. 1, p. 237
- Lycius, son of Polystratus, an Athenian, commandant of cavalry, Anab. III. iii. 20, p. 85; IV. iii. 22, p. 108; ib. 24, p. 109; IV. vii. 24, p. 125
- Lycius, of Syracuse, Anab. I. x. 14, p. 37
- Lycon, an Achaean, Anab. V. vi. 27, p. 155; VI. ii. 4, p. 173; VI. ii. 7 foll., p. 174
- Lycus, the river, Anab. VI. ii. 3, p. 173
- Lydia, Anab. I. ii. 5, p. 4; I. ix. 7, p. 32; III. v. 15, p. 95; VII. viii. 20, p. 240
- Lydian, Apollonides's ears bored like a, Anab. III. i. 31, p. 72

- Lydian market, the, Cyrus's Asiatic army, Anab. I. v. 6, p. 18
- Macistian, Silanus a, Anab. VII. iv. 16, p. 218
- Macrones, the, their territory and arms; exchange pledges with the Hellenes, Anab. IV. viii. 1 foll., p. 126 foll.; their conduct contrasted with that of the Cotyrorites, V. v. 18, p. 148; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Maeander, the river, Anab. I. ii. 5 foll., p. 4 foll.
- Maesades, the father of Seuthes, Anab. VII. ii. 32, p. 207; VII. v. 1, p. 220
- Magnesians, the, dance the Carpaea, Anab. VI. i. 7, p. 168 and note 2
- Mantineans, the, dance the "warriors' march," Anab. VI. i. 11, p. 168 and note 4
- Mardian mercenaries of Orontas, Anab. IV. iii. 4, p. 105
- Mariandynians, Anab. VI. ii. 1, p. 173
- Maronea, Heracleides of, Anab. VII. iii. 16, p. 211
- Marsyas, the river, sources near Celaenae, tributary of Maeander, here Apollo flayed Marsyas, Anab. I. ii. 8, p. 5
- Mascas, the river, Anab. I. v. 4, p. 16
- Medea, wife of the king of the Medes, Anab. III. iv. 11, p. 87 and note 1
- Medes, revolt of, from Darius, Anab. III. iv. 8 foll., p. 86 foll.
- Media, Anab. II. iv. 27, p. 55; III. v. 15, p. 95; wall of, I. vii. 15, p. 25 and note 2; II. iv. 12, p. 52
- Median and Persian women, their beauty, Anab. III. ii. 25, p. 79
- Medocus, king of the Odrysians, Anab. VII. ii. 32, p. 207; VII. iii. 16, p. 211; VII. vii. 3, p. 229; ib. 11, p. 230
- Medosades, an agent of Seuthes, Anab. VII. i. 5, p. 196; sent a second time, VII. ii. 10-24, pp. 204-206; and Xenophon, VII. vii. 1 foll., p. 229 foll.
- Megabyzus, sacristan of the goddess Artemis at Ephesus, Anab. V. iii. 6, p. 140; restores Xenophon his deposit, V. iii. 7, p. 141
- Megaphernes, a Persian nobleman, a wearer of the royal purple, put to death by Cyrus, Anab. I. ii. 20, p. 7
- Melanditae, the, Anab. VII. ii. 32, p. 207
- Melinophagi, the, or millet-eating Thracians, Anab. VII. v. 12, p. 221
- Menon, the Thessalian, joins Cyrus with one thousand hoplites and five hundred peltasts, Anab. I. ii. 6, p. 5; in command of the right at Tyriaeum, ib. 15, p. 7; sent to escort Epyaxa into Cilicia, ib. 20, p. 7; two of his companies lost, ib. 25, p. 8; his troops crossing the Euphrates first, is rewarded by Cyrus, I. iv. 13 foll., p. 16 foll.; dispute between his soldiers and those of Clearchus, I. v. 11, p. 19 foll.; commands the Hellenic left wing at midnight review, I. vii. 1, p. 23; and in the battle, I. viii. 4, p. 27; sent by Clearchus to Ariaeus, his friend, II. i. 5, p. 40; stays behind with Ariaeus, II. ii. 1, p. 43; suspected of slander by Clearchus, II. v. 28, p. 59; arrested with the others by Tissaphernes, ib. 31, p. 59 foll.; his character, II. vi. 21 foll., p. 64; dies the death of a felon, ib. 29, p. 66
- Mespila, the city, Anab. III. iv. 10-12, p. 86 note 4
- Midas, spring of, the king of Phrygia, Anab. I. ii. 13, p. 6
- Milesian, the, concubine of Cyrus, her escape, Anab. I. x. 3, p. 35
- Miletus, besieged by Cyrus, Anab. I. i. 7 foll., p. 2; Tamos's blockading squadron from, I. iv. 2, p. 13; why men of, did not choose Cyrus, I. ix. 9, p. 32
- Miltocythes, the Thracian, deserts to the king, Anab. II. ii. 7, p. 44
- Mithridates (or Mithradates, Hug. with C.), a friend of Cyrus, Anab.

- II. v. 35, p. 60; addresses the generals, III. iii. 1 foll., p. 82; appears again, ib. 6, p. 83; appears for the last time, III. iv. 2 foll., p. 85 foll.; governor of Lycania and Cappadocia, VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Mossynoecians, Hellenes reach the; confer with chiefs of, Anab. V. iv. 2 foll., p. 142 note 1; their order of battle and arms, ib. 11, p. 143; the high citadel of, ib. 15, p. 143; their king burnt in his mossyn, ib. 26, p. 145; their strange customs, ib. 30 foll., p. 146; Chalybes subject to, V. v. 1, p. 146; an independent tribe, VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Myriandus, a sea-coast city of Phoenicia, Anab. I. iv. 6, p. 4
- Mysia, Anab. VII. viii. 8, p. 238
- Mysians, the, and Orontas, Anab. I. vi. 7, p. 22; Pisidians and, I. ix. 14, p. 33; the, Pisidians, and Egyptians a source of trouble to Persia, II. v. 13 foll., p. 57; the, Pisidians, and Lycaonians maintain their independence against the king, III. ii. 23, p. 79 note 1; their dance, VI. i. 9 foll., p. 168 foll.
- Mysus, a Mysian, his ambushade, Anab. V. ii. 29, p. 139
- Nausicleides, and Bion, Anab. VII. viii. 6, p. 237
- Neon, the Asinaean, acts for Cheirisophus during his absence, Anab. V. vi. 36, p. 156; tells tales against Xenophon, V. vii. 1, p. 157; at the division of the army, advises separate action, VI. ii. 13, p. 175; succeeds Cheirisophus, VI. iv. 11, p. 182; at Calpe, rashly leads out a pillaging party and loses five hundred men, ib. 23 foll., p. 184; left to guard the camp, VI. v. 4, p. 185; aspires to command the whole army, VII. ii. 2 foll., p. 202; encamps apart at Perinthus, ib. 11, p. 204; and holds aloof from the other generals, ib. 17, p. 205; ib. 29, p. 207; VII. iii. 2, p. 208; plays into the hands of Aristarchus, ib. 7, p. 209
- Neontichos, a Thracian fortress promised by Seuthes, with Bisanthe and Ganos, to Xenophon, Anab. VII. v. 8, p. 220 note
- Nicander, a Lacedaemonian, puts Dexippus to death, Anab. V. i. 15, p. 134
- Nicarchus, the Arcadian, how he came riding into camp after the arrest of the generals, Anab. II. v. 33, p. 60; (the same, or another) Arcadian officer, deserts to the Persians with twenty men, III. iii. 5, p. 83
- Nicomachus, the Oetaean, in command of light infantry, his prowess as a volunteer, Anab. IV. vi. 20, p. 121
- Odrysiens, the, a Thracian tribe, and the Athenians related, Anab. VII. ii. 32, p. 207 and note; Medocus, king of the, VII. iii. 16, p. 211; join Seuthes in his campaign, VII. iv. 21, p. 219; the, flock down to join Seuthes, VII. v. 15, p. 222; Teres, an ancient hero of the, ib. 1, p. 220; a young man of the, with Medosades, VII. vii. 1 foll., p. 229 foll.
- Odysseus, "stretched out in sleep," like, Anab. V. i. 2, p. 132
- Oetaean, Nicomachus the, Anab. IV. vi. 20, p. 121
- Olympia, Scillus lies on the road to, Anab. V. iii. 7, p. 141; Temple of Zeus in, ib. 11, p. 141
- Olynthians, in service of Menon, Anab. I. ii. 6, p. 5
- Ophrynum, a town in the Troad, Anab. VII. viii. 5, p. 237
- Opis, a large city on the river Physeus, Anab. II. iv. 25, p. 54
- Orontas, a Persian of the royal family, his plot against Cyrus; trial and death of, Anab. I. vi. 1-10, pp. 21-23; his disloyalty to Cyrus exceptional, I. ix. 29, p. 35
- Orontas, son-in-law of Artaxerxes, accompanies the Greeks with Ariaeus and Tissaphernes, Anab. II. iv. 8 foll., p. 52; II. v. 40, p. 61; his

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

- a tributary of the Araxes, Anab. IV. vi. 4, p. 119
- Phasis, the river, in Colchis, Anab. V. vi. 36 foll., p. 157
- Philesius, an Achaean general, chosen in place of Menon, Anab. III. i. 47, p. 74; and Sophaenetos, as the two eldest generals, in charge of those sent by sea from Trapezus to Cerasus, V. iii. 1, p. 139; and Lycon, in opposition to Xenophon, V. vi. 27, p. 155; fined, V. viii. 1, p. 162; sent on an embassy to Anaxibius, VII. i. 32, p. 200; left with four others at the head of the army, VII. ii. 1, p. 202
- Philoxenus, of Pellene, his valour in attacking a fortress of the Drilae, Anab. V. ii. 15, p. 137
- Phocæan, the, concubine of Cyrus, witty and beautiful, captured by the king, Anab. I. x. 2, p. 35
- Phoenicia, Abrocomas leaves, with three hundred thousand men, Anab. I. iv. 7, p. 14; I. vii. 12, p. 25; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Phoenicians, Myriandus inhabited by, Anab. I. iv. 6, p. 14
- Phloe, Mount, game captured on, by Xenophon's sons, Anab. V. iii. 10, p. 141; its site, ib. note 1
- Phrasiæ, an Athenian officer, Anab. VI. v. 11, p. 186
- Phrygia, Cyrus marches through, Anab. I. ii. 6, p. 4; Cyrus satrap of Lydia and Great, and Cappadocia, I. ix. 7, p. 32; Timasion knows every corner of the Aeolid and, and the Troad, V. vi. 24, p. 154; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Phryniscus, an Achaean general, with Cleonor wishes to join Seuthes, Anab. VII. ii. 1, p. 202; with Xenophon visits Seuthes, ib. 29, p. 207; receives a pair of mules, VII. v. 4, p. 220; refuses to go on a campaign with Seuthes without Xenophon, ib. 10, p. 221
- Phrycus, the river, Anab. II. iv. 25, p. 54
- Pigres, a Persian, Cyrus's interpreter, Anab. I. ii. 17, p. 7; Glus and, ordered to extricate wagons, I. v. 7, p. 18; with Cyrus before the battle, I. viii. 12, p. 28
- Pisidians, Cyrus meditates an expedition against the, Anab. I. i. 11; I. ii. 1, p. 3; his war with the, and Mysians, I. ix. 14, p. 33; the, a source of trouble to the Persians, II. v. 13, p. 57; their independence, III. ii. 23, p. 79 and note 1
- Polus, a Laconian, succeeds Anaxibius as admiral, Anab. VII. ii. 5, p. 203
- Polycrates, an Athenian captain, surprises an Armenian village, Anab. IV. v. 24, p. 116; sent with a thirty-oared galley to collect vessels at Trapezus, V. i. 16, p. 135; visits Seuthes with Xenophon, VII. ii. 17, p. 205; ib. 29, p. 207; put forward by Xenophon, denounces Heracleides, VII. vi. 41, p. 228
- Polynicus, a Lacedæmonian, agent of Thibron, with Charminus, Anab. VII. vi. 1, p. 222; ib. 29, p. 228; ib. 43, p. 229; VII. vii. 13, p. 230; ib. 56, p. 236
- Pontus, or Black Sea, Anab. V. i. 15, p. 134; V. vi. 15 foll., p. 152 foll.; V. vii. 7, p. 158; VI. ii. 4, p. 173; VI. v. 20, p. 187; or Euxine, IV. viii. 22, p. 130; VII. v. 12, p. 221
- Procles, ruler of Teuthrania, a descendant of Damaratus, the Laconian, Anab. II. i. 3, p. 39 and note 1; II. ii. 1, p. 43; rescues the party attacking Asidates, VII. viii. 17, p. 239
- Proxenus, a Boeotian, a friend of Cyrus, joins him on an expedition against the Pisidians, Anab. I. i. 11, p. 3; with 1500 hoplites and 500 peltasts, I. ii. 3, p. 4; as an old friend invites Xenophon to join Cyrus on this expedition, III. i. 4, p. 68; tries to reconcile Clearchus and Menon, I. v. 14, p. 20; holds Hellenic centre in the battle, I. viii. 4, p. 27; Clearchus consults with, I. x. 5, p. 36; replies to the heralds from the king, II. i. 10, p. 41; Xenophon and, II. iv. 15, p.

- 53; made prisoner with the others by Tissaphernes, II. v. 31, p. 59; decapitated, II. vi. 1, p. 61; his character, II. vi. 16, p. 63, and note 1 p. 64; Xenophon's speech to his officers, III. i. 15 foll., p. 70; dedicatory offering to Apollo, inscribed with names of Xenophon and, V. iii. 5, p. 140
- Psarus, a river in Cilicia, Anab. I. iv. 1, p. 13
- Pylae, Babylonian and Cilician, see "Gates"
- Pyramus, a river in Cilicia, Anab. I. iv. 1, p. 13
- Pyrrhias, an Arcadian, Anab. VI. v. 11, p. 186
- Pythagoras, the Lacedaemonian admiral, joins Cyrus with thirty-five ships at Issi, Anab. I. iv. 2, p. 13
- Rhathines, Spithridates and, sent by Pharnabazus with their force to assist Bithynians, Anab. VI. v. 7, p. 186
- Rhodian slingers, a corps of, enrolled, their skill, Anab. III. iii. 16 foll., p. 84 foll.; more than a match for the Persians, III. iv. 15, p. 87; the clever device of a, to cross Tigris, III. v. 5, p. 94
- Rhoparas, governor of Babylon, Anab. VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note
- Sacred Mountain, Anab. VII. i. 14, and note 1 p. 198; VII. iii. 3, p. 209
- Salamis, the battle of, Anab. III. ii. 13, and note 3 p. 77
- Salmydessus, the Hellenes with Seuthes reach, Anab. VII. v. 12, and note 2 p. 221
- Samolas, the Achaean, sent on an embassy to Sinope, Anab. V. vi. 14, p. 152; in command of a brigade, VI. v. 11, p. 186
- Sardis, Cyrus collects his various armaments at, Anab. I. ii. 2, p. 3; sets out from, ib. 6, p. 4; Xenophon overtakes Proxenus and Cyrus at, III. i. 8, p. 69
- Satyr, the, and Midas, king of Phrygia, Anab. I. ii. 13, p. 6
- Scillus, Xenophon's estate at, in Triphylia, Anab. V. iii. 7, and note 5 p. 140
- Scythenians, the, Anab. IV. vii. 19, p. 124
- Scythians, the, bowmen, Anab. III. iv. 15 and note 3 p. 87
- Selinus, a river, at Scillus, like the, river at Ephesus, Anab. V. iii. 8, p. 141
- Selybria, or Selymbria, Medosades meets Xenophon at, Anab. VII. ii. 28, p. 207; Seuthes' Hellenic army quartered above, VII. v. 15, and note 1 p. 222
- Seuthes, a Thracian prince, son of Maesades (ex-king of the Odrysians, now dead), brought up at the court of Medocus, seeks to recover his empire, Anab. VII. ii. 32 foll., p. 207 foll.; sends Medosades to Xenophon at Chalcedon with overtures to the army, VII. i. 5, p. 196; later on Cleanor and Phryniscus wish to join, VII. ii. 2, p. 202; renews overtures to Xenophon at Selybria, ib. 10, p. 204; from Perinthus Xenophon visits, by night, ib. 17, p. 205; claims relationship with the Athenians, ib. 31 and note 1 p. 207; meets the Hellenes, who agree to take the field with him, VII. iii. 7 foll., p. 209 foll.; his royal entertainment, ib. 16 foll., p. 210 foll.; adopts Hellenic fashion of marching by night, ib. 37 foll., p. 214 foll.; captures, ib. 48, p. 216; and burns certain villages, VII. iv. 1 foll., p. 216; sends Heracleides to Perinthus to dispose of booty; his further proceedings against the Thynians and treatment of prisoners, ib. ib. foll.; the Thynians submit to, ib. 22, p. 219; in "the Delta," VII. v. 1, p. 220; proceeds of spoil, how distributed by, ib. 2 foll., p. 220; his alienation from Xenophon, ib. 7 foll., p. 220 foll.; reaches Salmydessus, ib. 12, p. 221 foll.; augmented by Odry-

- sians encamps above Selybria, ib. 15, p. 222; and the Laconian envoys, VII. vi. 3 foll., p. 222 foll.; introduces them to the Cyreians and listens to the debate, ib. 7 foll., p. 223 foll.; makes overtures to Xenophon through Abrozelmēs, ib. 42, p. 229; Xenophon sent by the Laconian envoys reads, a lecture, VII. vii. 20 foll., p. 231 foll.; satisfies the claims of the troops as far as is possible, ib. 55, p. 236
- Silanus, the Ambraciot, Cyrus's sooth-sayer, receives ten talents, Anab. I. vii. 18, p. 26; V. vi. 18, p. 153; spreads a story about Xenophon, ib. 17 foll., p. 153 foll.; is threatened by the soldiers, ib. 34, p. 156; charts a vessel and escapes from Heraclea, VI. iv. 13, p. 182
- Silanus, of Macistus, in Triphylia, a young trumpeter, Anab. VII. iv. 16, p. 218
- Sinope, Hellenic city in Paphlagonia, a colony of Miletus, mother city of Cotyora; with port Harmene, Anab. VI. i. 15, p. 169; a debate with ambassadors from, at Cotyora, V. v. 7, p. 147 foll.; an embassy sent to, V. vi. 13, p. 152; traders from Heraclea and, ib. 19, p. 153
- Sitalcas, the national Thracian hymn, Anab. VI. i. 6, p. 168
- Sittace, a city of Babylonia, on the Tigris, Anab. II. iv. 13, p. 53
- Smicres, the Arcadian general, Anab. VI. iii. 4, p. 176; is slain, ib. 5, p. 177
- Socrates, the Athenian, son of Sophroniscus, his feeling and advice to Xenophon in reference to Proxenus's invitation to join Cyrus, Anab. III. i. 5, and note 2 p. 68
- Socrates, the Achaean, a friend of Cyrus, collects troops for him against Tissaphernes, Anab. I. i. 11, p. 3; joins Cyrus at Sardis, I. ii. 3, p. 4; is seized by Tissaphernes, II. v. 31, p. 59; and put to death, II. vi. 1, p. 61; his blameless character, II. vi. 30, p. 66
- Soli, a city of Cilicia, Anab. I. ii. 24 p. 8
- Sophaenetes, an Arcadian (possibly Agias), joins Cyrus at Celaenae with one thousand hoplites, Anab. I. ii. 9, p. 5 and note 6
- Sophaenetes, the Stymphalian, a friend of Cyrus, collects troops for him against Tissaphernes, Anab. I. i. 11, p. 3; joins Cyrus at Sardis with one thousand hoplites, I. ii. 3, p. 4; with Cleanor and Xenophon interviews Ariaeus, II. v. 37, p. 60; left in command of the camp, IV. iv. 19, p. 112; and Philesius, as eldest generals, put in charge of the detachment going by sea from Trapezus, V. iii. 1, p. 139; fined for inadequate performance of a duty, V. viii. 1, p. 163; his cautious advice as to crossing a gully, VI. v. 13, p. 186
- Sosis, of Syracuse, joins Cyrus at Celaenae with a thousand hoplites, Anab. I. ii. 9, p. 5
- Soteridas, of Sicyon, and Xenophon, Anab. III. iv. 47, p. 92
- Spartan, Dracontius a, Anab. IV. viii. 25, p. 130
- Spithridates and Rhathines sent by Pharnabazus with their force to assist the Bithynians, Anab. VI. v. 7, p. 186
- Stratocles, a Cretan commander, Anab. IV. ii. 29, p. 105
- Sun, an Armenian headman priest of the, Anab. IV. v. 35, p. 118
- Susa, Anab. II. iv. 25, p. 54; III. v. 15, p. 95
- Syennesis, king of the Cilicians, Anab. I. ii. 12, p. 6; his palace, ib. 21, p. 8; the Cilician gates held by, I. iv. 4, p. 14; exchanges gifts with Cyrus, I. ii. 27, p. 9
- Syria, the gates of Cilicia and, Anab. I. iv. 3 foll., p. 14; the palace of Belesys, ruler of, ib. 9, p. 15
- Syrians, regard fish as gods, Anab. I. iv. 9, p. 15
- Tamos, the Egyptian, Cyrus's admiral, Anab. I. ii. 21, p. 8; brings fleet

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

lidas, V. vi. 23, p. 154; informs certain traders from Heraclea and Sinope of Xenophon's colonisation scheme, ib. 19, p. 153 foll.; revives the scheme, ib. 36, p. 157; commands the cavalry in Xenophon's division, while rescuing the Arcadians, VI. iii. 12, p. 178; and against the Bithynians, VI. v. 28, p. 188; and during the Thracian campaign with Seuthes, VII. iii. 46, p. 215; his goblets and Persian carpets, and present to Seuthes, ib. 18 foll., p. 211 foll.; receives a pair of mules, VII. v. 3, p. 220; refuses to campaign without Xenophon, ib. 10, p. 221

Timesitheus, the Trapezuntine, proxenus of the Mossynoecians, Anab. V. iv. 2-4, p. 142

Tiribazus, governor of Western Armenia, the "king's friend," Anab. IV. iv. 4, p. 110; VII. viii. 25, p. 240 note; makes a treaty with the Hellenes, and marches beside them to certain villages, IV. iv. 4 foll., p. 110; plans to attack the Hellenic army as they cross a pass, ib. 18, p. 112; the camp with the tent, etc. of, captured, ib. 21, p. 113

Tissaphernes, goes with Cyrus to Darius; accuses Cyrus to Artaxerxes, Anab. I. i. 2 foll., p. 1; Ionian cities belonging to, with the exception of Miletus, revolt to Cyrus; to defeat a similar conspiracy in Miletus, he kills some of the citizens and banishes others, ib. 6, p. 2; see I. ix. 9, p. 32; war between, and Cyrus, ib. 8, p. 2; warns Artaxerxes of Cyrus's designs, I. ii. 4, p. 4; is one of the king's four generals, I. vii. 12, p. 25; I. viii. 9, p. 27; what became of, and his division in the battle, I. x. 5 foll., p. 36; Phalinus and other heralds arrive from the king and, II. i. 7, p. 40; sent on a deputation with others, promises to conduct the army back to Hellas, II. iii. 17 foll., p. 49; oaths and pledges exchanged between, and the Hellenes, ib. 26, p. 50; his suspicious delay and conduct when the march commences, II. iv. 1, p. 50 foll.; hands over the villages of Parysatis to the Hellenes to plunder, ib. 27, p. 55; interview of Clearchus with, II. v. 2-25, pp. 55-59; entraps and puts to death five generals and twenty captains of the Hellenes, ib. 32, p. 59; Mithridates and a relation of, present themselves at the Zepatas, III. iii. 4, p. 83; compact between Mithridates and, III. iv. 2, p. 85; abortive attack of, with a large army upon the Hellenes, ib. 13, p. 87; hangs on the skirts of the Hellenic army with his skirmishers, ib. 18, p. 88; his army out-marched and out-manceuvred, witnesses the storming of a pass, and finally retires burning their own villages, ib. 32 foll., pp. 90-93; the Lacedaemonians open a campaign against him, VII. vi. 1, p. 222; ib. 7, p. 223; Thibron with the Cyreians prosecutes the war against, and Pharnabazus, VII. viii. 24, p. 240

Tolmides, the Eleian, "the best herald of his time," with Clearchus, Anab. II. ii. 20, p. 46; III. i. 46, p. 74; V. ii. 18, p. 137

Tralles, a town in Caria, Anab. I. iv. 8, p. 15

Tranipsae, a Thracian tribe, Anab. VII. ii. 32, p. 207

Trapezus, a town of Pontus (mod. Trebizond), a colony of Sinope in Colchis, Anab. IV. viii. 22, p. 130; pays tribute to Sinope, V. v. 10, p. 148

Triphylia, see Scillus, p. 140

Troad, the, Anab. V. vi. 24, p. 154; VII. viii. 7, p. 237

Tyriaeum, a town of Phrygia, Anab. I. ii. 14, p. 6

Xanthicles, an Achaean, chosen as general in place of Socrates, Anab. III. i. 47, p. 74; condemned to pay a fine, V. viii. 1, p. 162

Xenias, of Parrhasia in Arcadia, accompanies Cyrus with three hundred hoplites on his visit to Darius, Anab. I. i. 2, p. 1; in command of Cyrus's foreign troops in the cities; joins Cyrus at Sardis, I. ii. 3, p. 4; celebrates the Lycaea at Peltæ, ib. 10, p. 6; in jealousy of Clearchus, with Pasion deserts Cyrus at Myriandus, I. iv. 7, p. 14.

Xenophon, an Athenian, customary worship in his family, Anab. VII. viii. 5, p. 237; how he came to accompany Cyrus at the invitation of Proxenus his friend; the advice Socrates gave him on the subject, and how he followed it, III. i. 4, p. 68; a sign from Zeus the King sent him, as he sets out from Ephesus to associate himself with Cyrus at Sardis (cf. Cyrop. II. i. 1), VI. i. 23, p. 171; agrees to join in an excursion against the Pisidians, III. i. 8, p. 69; his motive for continuing the expedition when, in Cilicia, Cyrus's object was plain, ib. 10, p. 69; his conversation with Cyrus just before the battle, I. viii. 15 foll., p. 28 foll.; and Proxenus, II. iv. 15, p. 53; with Cleanor and Sophaenetes interviews Ariaeus wishing to hear news of Proxenus, after the seizure of the generals, Oct. 22, B.C. 401, II. vi. 37, p. 60 foll.; his answer to Ariaeus, ib. 41, p. 61; his dream on the night of the 22nd, sent him by Zeus the King; its import, its immediate effect upon him, III. i. 11 foll., p. 69; gets up and calls together Proxenus's officers; his speech to them, offering to lead or follow as they think best, ib. 15-25, pp. 69-71; they, with one exception, Apollonides, beg him to lead, ib. 26 foll., p. 71 foll.; with Proxenus's officers summons the generals and officers of the other divisions, about one hundred, who meet in the place of arms about midnight; his speech, ib. 33 foll., p. 72 foll.; and Cheirisophus; is chosen among the five new generals in place of Proxenus, ib. 47, p. 74; speaks (for the third time) after Cheirisophus and Cleanor to the general meeting of the soldiers, in the early morning, arrayed in his finest apparel, III. ii. 7 foll., p. 75 foll.; turns an omen from Zeus the Saviour happily to account, ib. 8, p. 76; at his suggestion they register a vow to pay offerings of salvation "according to their ability" (cf. Mem. I. iii. 3); continuing speech illustrates from Mysians and Pisidians (cf. Mem. III. v. 26); quotes Homer (Od. ix. 94); the germ of his colonisation scheme, ib. 26, p. 79 foll. and note 1 p. 80; his proposals (1) to burn wagons, etc., (2) as to discipline, are put to the assembly by Cheirisophus and carried, ib. 27-33, p. 80 foll.; his further proposals as to order of march and divisional commands; Cheirisophus, the Lacedaemonian, in the van, Cleanor and Sophaenetes on the wings, Timasion and himself, as the two youngest, in the rear, also carried, ib. 34-38, p. 81 foll.; his final speech, ib. 39, p. 82; his probable age, note 1 p. 82; his method of working the rearguard; blamed by Cheirisophus and the elder generals for useless exposure of himself and men; admits the mistake; his excuse; points out need of slingers and cavalry; his proposals to supply the defect; his own horses; his proposals carried, a corps of slingers and fifty horse equipped (cf. Hipparch.), III. iii. 8-20, pp. 83-85; his remarks on new tactical formation, III. iv. 19 foll., p. 88 foll.; summoned by Cheirisophus to the front; consulted as to how the enemy should be dislodged from a commanding position on the right where the army must pass; offers as the younger to occupy a height above the point in question, but stipulates for a division of light infantry; races the enemy, and seizes the point, ib. 38-49, pp. 91-93; and Soteridas, ib. 47 foll., p.

92; and Cheirisophus; his happy remark when the Persians took to burning their own villages, III. v. 4-6, p. 93 foll.; in command of the rear (as usual) as they enter Carduchia; difficulties sustained by; takes Cheirisophus to task for not waiting; his two prisoners questioned as to the road, IV. i. 6-25, pp. 97-100; with his rearguard draws off the enemy's attention from the storming party; with the rearguard follows the path taken by the storming party as being best for beasts; his conduct of this division through a hard struggle; at one point is left by his shield-bearer and protected by Eurylochus of Lusia; with Cheirisophus arranges to recover the dead, IV. ii. 2-23, pp. 101-104; his prophetic dream at the Centrites (see above, p. 69), his stratagem to cross, IV. iii. 8-34, pp. 106-110; rouses himself to get up in the snow; his example, IV. iv. 12 foll., p. 111 foll.; relieves some men suffering from boulimia; saves a party of men who had fallen out owing to cold and fatigue; with his men forced to bivouac in the open without fire and supperless; kindly entreats the head-man of an Armenian village, and presents him with a favourite old horse, IV. v. 7-28, pp. 114-117; his one quarrel with Cheirisophus; his plan for stealing across a mountain barrier, and exchange of raillery with Cheirisophus as to stealing, IV. vi. 1-19, pp. 118-121; his suggestions for storming a Taochian fortress adopted, IV. vii. 4 foll., p. 122 foll.; with the rearguard approaching Mount Theches, ib. 22 foll., p. 125; and the light infantry soldier who recognises the speech of the Macrones, IV. viii. 4 foll., p. 126 foll.; advises a change of tactics in storming a hill held by the Colchians, his proposal carried, and carried out successfully; quotes Homer (Il. iv.

35), ib. 10 foll., p. 127 foll.; his advice how to employ their time at Trapezus whilst awaiting Cheirisophus's return with vessels; his proposals with one exception carried; his advice to the cities to construct roads, V. i. 5-14, p. 133 foll.; leads half the army to attack the Drilae, his tactics in storming their chief fastness and in retiring from the place, V. ii. 8 foll., pp. 135-138; receives his portion as one of the five generals of the tithe selected for Apollo and Artemis at Cerasus; history of what he did with his share, V. iii. 4-13, pp. 140-142 (see below); and the Mossynoecian chiefs, V. iv. 4, p. 142; his speech at a meeting of the soldiers in reference to a disaster shared by some of themselves who had fought without orders, ib. 19 foll., p. 144; his speech to the ambassadors from Sinope defending the conduct of the army towards the Cotyorites, V. v. 13 foll., p. 148 foll.; states to the ambassadors their decision to go by sea, if the Sinopeans will supply ships, V. vi. 12 foll., p. 152; his colonisation scheme: how the thought shaped itself in his mind; with Silanus consults the victims; intrigues in consequence; and Timasion and Thorax, ib. 15-25, pp. 152-155; his apology; explains his habit of sacrificing; as to the particular project has "done with that dream"; his proposal to keep the army together by all means and set off for Hellas carried, Silanus alone dissenting, ib. 28-34, pp. 152-156; the Heracleots and, ib. 35, p. 156; the generals and, ib. 36, p. 157; Neon sets a new story afloat concerning, V. vii. 1 foll., p. 157; calls a general meeting; his speech in self-defence, and warning against a real danger looming; in reference to what happened at Cerasus, resolutions are passed and prosecutions instituted, and further upon his representation, with the concurrence of

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

DELVE INTO FANTASY, MAGIC, MYTHOLOGY & FOLKLORE

Forgotten Books'
Full Membership gives
access to 797,885 ancient
and modern, fiction and
non-fiction books.

Continue

*Fair usage policy applies

(Anaxibius puts a triacontar at his service and gives him a letter to the Perinthians); rejoins army at Selybria, VII. ii. 8 foll., p. 203 foll., and Aristarchus, the new harmost, who intervenes, and at Perinthus forbids him to take the troops across to Asia, ib. 12, p. 204; getting wind of a plot "he would be seized and either meet some ill fate there or be delivered up to Pharnabazus," turns back on the ground that he has a sacrifice to make; he asks, "would the gods allow him to try and bring the army over to Seuthes?" since to cross was unsafe and to be cooped up in Chersonese terrible; the victims are favourable to his project, ib. 12 foll., p. 204 foll.; with Polycrates and others visits Seuthes by night, ib. 17, p. 205; and Seuthes, ib. 20 foll., p. 206 foll.; in case of difficulties (with Lacedaemon) Seuthes offers to make him his son-in-law and to give him Bisanthe, and so the deputation returns, ib. 35 foll., p. 208; explains the situation to the soldiers, proposing they should go where they can get provisions and decide between Seuthes and Aristarchus; addresses the soldiers, not counting Neon's men; with the army meets Seuthes who leads them to some villages to get provisions; Seuthes stipulates with, that the army, if they follow him, should never be more than seven days' journey from the sea; at a meeting puts the motion to the vote; it is carried unanimously and they take the field with Seuthes, VII. iii. 1 foll., p. 208 foll.; in a dilemma at the royal entertainment; his after dinner speech; presents the soldiers; drains the cup fraternally, ib. 20 foll., p. 211 foll.; his advice to Seuthes to follow Hellenic order on the night march, ib. 37, p. 214; an instance of his youthful activity; part played by him in capturing some Thracian villages, ib. 45 foll.,

p. 215 foll.; sent with the youngest booplites against some upland villages; explains the nature of Episthenes to Seuthes; encamped with a picked force in dangerous quarters on the hills; interviewed by a party of the mountaineers, undertakes to arrange a truce, but is attacked next night by a party who set the village on fire; gallant escape and defeat of the assailants; successful expedition with Seuthes against these mountaineers who supplicate for terms; his generous answer to Seuthes concerning their fate, VII. iv. 6 foll., p. 217 foll.; offered the pick of the spoils on the return of Heracleides, begs that his colleagues should be rewarded first; reproaches Heracleides for having brought back by his trafficking only two-thirds of the pay due; annoys Heracleides thus, and Seuthes, by constantly demanding the soldiers' pay, so that the latter seems to forget all about the sea-board fortresses; consequently hesitates as to marching farther up the country; Timasion, Phryniscus, and Cleonor will not continue the campaign without; overtures to, who with the rest agrees to a further campaign to Salmydessus and back to Selybria; annoyance of the soldiers with, because there is no pay, VII. v. 2 foll., p. 220 foll.; his character as described by Seuthes and Heracleides to two Laconian agents from Thibron, who is anxious to avail himself of the troops, VII. vi. 4 foll., p. 223; an Arcadian upbraids him to the Laconian envoys for selfishly keeping them in Thrace instead of letting them join the Laconians; defends himself, showing that his conduct was unselfish; the testimony of the Laconian agent Charminus, who repeats what they had been told of his character, ib. 8-39, pp. 223-228; Polycrates put forward by, proposes to seize Heracleides, who is a false Hellene, ib. 41, p. 228; Seuthes sends his private interpreter to, begging him to stay with a thousand hoplites, renews his promise about the sea-board places, and advises him that Thibron means to put him to death; similar messages coming from other quarters warning him that he was calumniated and should be on his guard; he sacrifices to Zeus the King, "shall he stay with Seuthes or depart," and the god answers "depart," ib. 43 foll., p. 229; Medosades in the presence of an Odrysian chief orders him to be gone out of the land and not injure his territory; his reply to this attack; Medosades urges him to summon the two Laconians to hear his expostulations; he does so, suggesting to the Laconians what answer to make, so as to recover the pay that is due; he puts to Medosades a crucial question; as a result of the interview is sent with a serviceable staff, along with Medosades, to Scuthes, VII. vii. 2-19, pp. 229-231; reads Seuthes a lecture, ib. 20-47, pp. 229-235; Seuthes penitently promises to pay, and renews his offers to, who courteously refuses and with friendly assurances departs; his jest touching the talent; his words "somewhere I may rise to honour" (cf. Hell. III. ii. 9), ib. 48-54, p. 235 foll.; soldiers glad to see him back, he hands over the property to the Laconian agents, ib. 55 foll., p. 236; his own intention to return home (which he was free to do at this date) postponed, at the request of the authorities, who begged him first to hand over the army to Thibron, ib. 57, p. 236; crossing with the troops to Lampsacus meets Eucleides, the soothsayer of his family, who congratulates him on his safety, but is surprised at his lack of gold; Eucleides can hardly believe it, but seeing how sorry a sacrifice he offers to Apollo in his presence, is persuaded of the fact; the real obstacle discovered by the soothsayer to be Xenophon's self, and Zeus Meilichios a further obstacle, he is persuaded to sacrifice in the "old customary way"; does so at Ophrynium, offering a holocaust of swine after the custom of his family, and the signs are favourable, VII. viii. 1-5, p. 237; Bion and Nausicleides, two agents, hospitably entertained by, repurchase for him a horse which he had sold at Lampsacus for fifty darics, suspecting that he had parted with it out of need, and hearing he was fond of the beast, refuse to be remunerated, ib. 6, p. 237; at Pergamus, is entertained at the house of Hellas, wife of Gongylus, the Eretrian, and mother of Gorgion and Gongylus (cf. Hell. III. i. 6); she suggests to him the capture of Asidates, a Persian notable (her cousin and a friend, Daphnagoras, are to go too); he and they sacrifice; victims promise success; he takes the pick of his friends, e.g. Agasias, as he wishes to do them a good turn; misadventure; with his friends, rescued by Procles, ib. 8-18, p. 238 foll.; sacrifices next day; leads out the whole army; captures Asidates and all that he had; his cause for gratitude to God, since the Laconians, the officers, the other generals, and the soldiers united to give him the pick of horses, cattle teams, etc., so that he was now in a position himself to do another a good turn, ib. 20-23, p. 240; incorporates the troops with Thibron's Hellenic forces who proceed to prosecute a war against Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, ib. 24, p. 240

Xerxes, his palace and citadel at Celaenae, Anab. I. ii. 9, p. 5; conquered by land and sea, III. ii. 13, p. 77

Zapatas, the river (the greater Zab),

- a tributary of the Tigris, Anab. II. v. 1, p. 55 ; passage of the, III. iii. 6, p. 83
- Zelarchus, clerk of the market at Cerasus, Anab. V. vii. 24, p. 160 ; ib. 29, p. 161
- Zeus, the Saviour, an omen from, Anab. III. ii. 9, p. 76 ; thank-offerings to, at Trapezus, IV. viii. 24, p. 130 ; a watchword, VI. v. 25, p. 188 ; the King, named to Xenophon by the oracle at Delphi, VI. i. 22, p. 170 ; gives Xenophon a sign when setting out from Ephesus, ib. 23, p. 171 ; Xenophon's dream on the night of the murder of the officers, sent to him by, ib. and III. i. 12, p. 69 ; Meilichios, an obstacle to Xenophon, VII. viii. 4, p. 237 and note
- Zeus, the temple of, in Olympia, Anab. V. iii. 11, p. 141

THIS PAGE IS LOCKED TO FREE MEMBERS

Purchase full membership to immediately unlock this page

Know Your Bible

Forgotten Books' Full Membership provides unlimited access to more than 28,000 volumes of Christian literature for $8.99/month

HOLY BIBLE

Continue

*Fair use policy applies

Printed by R. & R. CLARK, LIMITED, Edinburgh.

THE WORKS OF XENOPHON.

TRANSLATED BY

H. G. DAKYNS, M.A.,

LATE ASSISTANT MASTER IN CLIFTON COLLEGE

In Four Volumes. Crown 8vo.

Volume I. HELLENICA, Books I. and II. and ANABASIS. 10s. 6d.
[Macmillan and Co., 1890.]

CLASSICAL REVIEW.—"A sound and interesting piece of work which it is exceedingly desirable should be brought as soon as possible to completion."

SPEAKER.—"The translator has contrived to be both vigorous and accurate . . . The translation is a really sound and excellent piece of work."

SPECTATOR.—"If the whole be kept up to the level reached in this part, it will be a really admirable piece of work."

Volume II. HELLENICA, Books III.-VII., AGESILAUS: an Encomium; THE POLITY OF THE ATHENIANS; THE POLITY OF THE LACEDAEMONIANS; WAYS AND MEANS, a Pamphlet on Revenues 10s. 6d.
[Macmillan and Co., 1892.]

ACADEMY.—"Mr. Dakyns is doing scholarship a real service, no less by ventilating these questions about Xenophon, than by giving us a complete translation. His rendering of the Greek is careful and accurate; and he supplies maps, analyses, and all necessary information."

JOURNAL OF EDUCATION.—"Mr. Dakyns has fulfilled the promise given by his first volume of producing a thoroughly readable book. He is never dull. As a rule the force of the original is given in vigorous, racy language."

CAMBRIDGE REVIEW.—"No serious student of Greek history should be without Mr. Dakyns' volumes. Of the translation we need only say that it stands on a level with the translations, in the truest sense classical, of Jowett and Verrall."

Volume III. Part I. THE MEMORABILIA and APOLOGY; the ECONOMIST (Oeconomic): a Treatise on the Science of the Household in the form of a Dialogue; SYMPOSIUM (Convivium) or THE BANQUET; HIERO, or "THE TYRANT": a Discourse on Despotic Rule. 10s. 6d.

ACADEMY.—"Every page that Mr. Dakyns writes testifies to his own sterling scholarship and to his intimate acquaintance with the subjects of which he treats."

Volume III. Part II. THREE ESSAYS: on the Duties of a Cavalry General (Hipparch); on Horsemanship; and on Hunting (Cynegeticus). 5s.
[Macmillan and Co., 1897.]

NATURE.—"We may pass to Mr. Dakyns' translation of the Cynegeticus. . . . The work is a marvellous display of close and intelligent observation by an enthusiastic sportsman, and will be full of interest to persons of similar taste in the present day. . . . Any sportsman into whose hand the book falls will feel grateful to him for rendering accessible the work of, perhaps, the acutest observer of outdoor life in antiquity."

Volume IV. THE CYROPAEDIA.

[In preparation.]

MACMILLAN AND CO., LTD., LONDON

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE GREEK.

- ÆSCHYLUS.—THE SUPPLICES. With Translation by T. G. TUCKER, Litt.D. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- THE SEVEN AGAINST THEBES. With Translation by A. W. VERRALL, Litt.D. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- THE CHOEPHORI. With Translation by A. W. VERRALL, Litt.D. 8vo. 12s.
- EUMENIDES. With Verse Translation by BERNARD DRAKE, M.A. 8vo. 5s.
- ARISTOPHANES.—THE BIRDS. Translated into English Verse by B. H. KENNEDY. 8vo. 6s.
- ARISTOTLE.—THE FALLACIES; or, THE SOPHISTIC ELENCHI. With Translation by E. POSTE, M.A. 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- THE FIRST BOOK OF THE METAPHYSICS. Translated into English Prose by a Cambridge Graduate. 8vo. 5s.
- THE POLITICS. Translated by Bishop WELLDON. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- THE RHETORIC. Translated by Bishop WELLDON. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- THE NICOMACHEAN ETHICS. Translated by Bishop WELLDON. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- ON THE CONSTITUTION OF ATHENS. By E. POSTE. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- THE POETICS. By S. H. BUTCHER, Litt.D. 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. Text and Translation. 4s. 6d. net.
- BACCHYLIDES.—A PROSE TRANSLATION. By E. POSTE, M.A., Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford. Crown 8vo. 2s.
- EURIPIDES.—THE TRAGEDIES IN ENGLISH VERSE. By A. S. WAY, M.A. Three vols. Crown 8vo. 6s. net each.
- ALCESTIS, HECUBA, MEDEA. Separately, sewed. 1s. 6d. each.
- HERODOTUS.—THE HISTORY. Translated by G. C. MACAULAY, M.A. Two vols. Crown 8vo. 18s.
- HOMER.—THE ODYSSEY DONE INTO ENGLISH PROSE. By S. H. BUTCHER, M.A., and A. LANG, M.A. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
- THE ODYSSEY. Books I.-XII. Translated into English Verse by EARL OF CARNARVON. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- THE ILIAD DONE INTO ENGLISH PROSE. By ANDREW LANG, WALTER LEAF, and ERNEST MYERS. Crown 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- THE ILIAD DONE INTO ENGLISH VERSE. By A. S. WAY, M.A. Two vols. 4to. 10s. 6d. net.
- PAUSANIAS.—DESCRIPTION OF GREECE. By J. G. FRAZER, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Six vols. 8vo. 126s. net.
- PINDAR.—THE EXTANT ODES. Translated by ERNEST MYERS. Crown 8vo. 5s.
- PLATO.—THE TIMÆUS. With Translation by R. D. ARCHER-HIND, M.A. 8vo. 16s.
- POLYBIUS.—THE HISTORIES. Translated by E. S. SHUCKBURGH. Crown 8vo. 24s.
- SOPHOOCLES.—ŒDIPUS THE KING. Translated into English Verse by E. D. A. MORSHEAD, M.A. Fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Specimens of Greek Tragedy. Translated by GOLDWIN SMITH, D.C.L. Two vols. Globe 8vo. 10s.
- THEOCRITUS, BION, AND MOSCHUS. Rendered into English Prose by A. LANG, M.A. Pott 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN AND CO., LTD., LONDON.